PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

OF

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE FIRST SESSION OF THE SEVENTH CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, DECEMBER 7, 1801.

MONDAY, December 7, 1801.

The first session of the Seventh Congress of the United States commenced this day, conformably to the Constitution, and the Senate assembled at the Capitol in the City of Washington.

PRESENT:

THEODORE FOSTER, from Rhode Island;
NATHANIEL CHIPMAN, from Vermont;
WILLIAM HILL WELLS and SAMUEL WHITE, from Delaware;
JOHN E. HOWARD, from Maryland;
STEVENS THOMPSON MASON and WILSON CARY NICHOLAS, from Virginia;
ABRAHAM BALDWIN, from Georgia;
JOSEPH ANDERSON and WILLIAM COCKE, from Tennessee.

STEPHEN R. BRADLEY, appointed a Senator by the State of Vermont, for the remainder of the term for which their late Senator, Elijah Paine, was appointed; JOHN BRECKENRIDGE, appointed a Senator by the State of Kentucky; CHRISTOPHER ELLERY, appointed a Senator by the State of Rhode Island, for the remainder of the term for which their late Senator, Ray Greene, was appointed; JAMES JACKSON, appointed a Senator by the State of Georgia; GEORGE LOGAN, appointed a Senator by the Executive of the State of Pennsylvania, in the place of their late Senator, Peter Muhlenberg, resigned; SIMEON OLCOTT, appointed a Senator by the State of New Hampshire, for the remainder of the term for which their late Senator, Samuel Livermore, was appointed; URIAH TRACY, appointed a Senator by the State of Connecticut; and ROBERT WRIGHT, appointed a Senator by the State of Maryland, severally produced their credentials, and took their seats in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent, the Senate proceeded to the election of a President pro tempore, as the Constitution provides; and ABRAHAM BALDWIN was chosen.

The PRESIDENT administered the oath, as the law prescribes, to Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, Mr. ELLERY, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. OLCOTT, Mr. TRACY, and Mr. WRIGHT, and the affirmation to Mr. LOGAN.

Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the President of the United States and acquaint him that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and that, in the absence of the VICE PRESIDENT, they have elected ABRAHAM BALDWIN President of the Senate, pro tempore.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and ready to proceed to business, and that, in the absence of the Vice President, they have elected ABRAHAM BALDWIN President of the Senate pro tempore.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that a quorum of the House is assembled, and have elected NATHANIEL MACON their Speaker, and are ready to proceed to business.

Ordered, That Messrs. ANDERSON and JACKSON be a committee on the part of the Senate, together with such committee as the House of Representatives may appoint on their part, to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and have appointed a committee on their part.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to join such gentlemen as shall be appointed by the House of Representatives, to take into consideration a statement made this day by the Secretary of the Senate, respecting books and maps purchased in consequence of an act of Congress, passed 24th April, 1800, and to make report of their opinion respecting the future arrangement of said books and maps; and that Messrs. TRACY and NICHOLAS be the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. ANDERSON reported, from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States and acquainted him that a quorum of both Houses is assembled, and that the President of the United States informed the committee that he would make a communication to them by message to-morrow.

TUESDAY, December 8.

JONATHAN DAYTON, and AARON OGDEN, from the State of New Jersey; and JESSE FRANKLIN

SENATE.

President's Message.

from the State of North Carolina, severally attended.

Resolved, That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress for the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House concur in the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee respecting the books and maps purchased in pursuance of an act of Congress, of the 24th of April, 1800, and have appointed a committee on their part. They agree to the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of two Chaplains during the present session.

Resolved, That each Senator be supplied, during the present session, with three such newspapers, printed in any of the States, as he may choose, provided that the same be furnished at the rate usual for the annual charge of such papers.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The following Letter and Message were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by Mr. Lewis, his Secretary :

DECEMBER 8, 1801.

SIR: The circumstances under which we find ourselves at this place rendering inconvenient the mode heretofore practised, of making by personal address the first communications between the Legislative and Executive branches, I have adopted that by Message, as used on all subsequent occasions through the session. In doing this I have had principal regard to the convenience of the Legislature, to the economy of their time, to their relief from the embarrassment of immediate answers, on subjects not yet fully before them, and to the benefits thence resulting to the public affairs. Trusting that a procedure founded in these motives will meet their approbation, I beg leave, through you, sir, to communicate the enclosed Message, with the documents accompanying it, to the honorable the Senate, and pray you to accept, for yourself and them, the homage of my high respect and consideration.

TH: JEFFERSON.

THE HON. the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate, and House of Representatives :

It is a circumstance of sincere gratification to me that, on meeting the great council of our nation, I am able to announce to them, on grounds of reasonable certainty, that the wars and troubles which for so many years afflicted our sister nations, have at length come to an end; and that the communications of peace and commerce are once more opening among them. Whilst we devoutly return thanks to the beneficent Being who has been pleased to breathe into them the spirit of conciliation and forgiveness, we are bound, with peculiar gratitude, to be thankful to Him that our own peace has been preserved through so perilous a season, and ourselves permitted quietly to cultivate the earth, and to practice and improve those arts which tend to increase our comforts. The assurances, indeed, of friendly disposition, received from all the Powers with whom we have principal relations, had inspired a confidence that our peace with them would not have been disturbed. But a cessation of irregularities which had affected the commerce of neutral nations, and of the irritations and injuries produced by them, cannot but add to this confidence, and strengthens, at the same time, the hope that wrongs committed on unoffending friends, under a pressure of circumstances, will now be reviewed with candor, and will be considered as founding just claims of retribution for the past, and new assurances for the future.

Among our Indian neighbors, also, a spirit of peace and friendship generally prevails; and I am happy to inform you that the continued efforts to introduce among them the implements and the practice of husbandry, and of the household arts, have not been without success; that they are becoming more and more sensible of the superiority of this dependence for clothing and subsistence, over the precarious resources of hunting and fishing; and already we are able to announce that, instead of that constant diminution of their numbers, produced by their wars and their wants, some of them begin to experience an increase of population.

To this state of general peace with which we have been blessed, one only exception exists. Tripoli, the least considerable of the Barbary States, had come forward with demands unfounded either in right or in compact, and had permitted itself to denounce war, on our failure to comply before a given day. The style of the demands admitted but one answer. I sent a small squadron of frigates into the Mediterranean, with assurances to that Power of our sincere desire to remain in peace; but with orders to protect our commerce against the threatened attack. The measure was seasonable and salutary. The Bey had already declared war. His cruisers were out. Two had arrived at Gibraltar. Our commerce in the Mediterranean was blockaded, and that of the Atlantic in peril. The arrival of our squadron dispelled the danger. One of the Tripolitan cruisers, having fallen in with and engaged the small schooner Enterprise, commanded by Lieutenant Sterret, which had gone as a tender to our larger vessels, was captured, after a heavy slaughter of her men, without the loss of a single one on our part. The bravery exhibited by our citizens on that element will, I trust, be a testimony to the world that it is not the want of that virtue which makes us seek their peace, but a conscientious desire to direct the energies of our nation to the multiplication of the human race, and not to its destruction. Unauthorized by the Constitution, without the sanction of Congress, to go beyond the line of defence, the vessel, being disabled from committing further hostilities, was liberated with its crew. The Legislature will doubtless consider whether, by authorizing measures of offence also, they will place our force on an equal footing with that of its adversaries. I communicate all material information on this subject, that, in the exercise of this important function confided by the Constitution to the Legislature exclusively, their judgment may form itself on a knowledge and consideration of every circumstance of weight.

I wish I could say that our situation with all the other Barbary States was entirely satisfactory. Discovering that some delays had taken place in the performance of certain articles stipulated by us, I thought it my duty, by immediate measures for fulfilling them, to vindicate to ourselves the right of considering the effect of departure from stipulation on their side. From the papers which will be laid before you, you will be enabled to judge whether our treaties are regarded by them as fixing at all the measure of their demands, or, as guarding from the exercise of force our vessels within their power; and to consider how far it will be safe and expedient to leave our affairs with them in their present posture.

DECEMBER, 1801.

President's Message.

SENATE.

I lay before you the result of the census lately taken of our inhabitants, to a conformity with which we are now to reduce the ensuing ratio of representation and taxation. You will perceive that the increase of numbers, during the last ten years, proceeding in geometrical ratio, promises a duplication in little more than twenty-two years. We contemplate this rapid growth, and the prospect it holds up to us, not with a view to the injuries it may enable us to do to others in some future day, but to the settlement of the extensive country still remaining vacant within our limits, to the multiplication of men susceptible of happiness, educated in the love of order, habituated to self-government, and valuing its blessings above all price.

Other circumstances, combined with the increase of numbers, have produced an augmentation of revenue arising from consumption, in a ratio far beyond that of population alone; and, though the changes in foreign relations now taking place, so desirably for the whole world, may for a season affect this branch of revenue, yet, weighing all probabilities of expense, as well as of income, there is reasonable ground of confidence that we may now safely dispense with all the internal taxes—comprehending excise, stamps, auctions, licenses, carriages, and refined sugars; to which the postage on newspapers may be added, to facilitate the progress of information; and that the remaining sources of revenue will be sufficient to provide for the support of Government, to pay the interest of the public debts, and to discharge the principals within shorter periods than the laws or the general expectation had contemplated. War, indeed, and untoward events, may change this prospect of things, and call for expenses which the imposts could not meet. But sound principles will not justify our taxing the industry of our fellow-citizens to accumulate treasure for wars to happen we know not when, and which might not, perhaps, happen, but from the temptations offered by that treasure.

These views, however, of reducing our burdens, are formed on the expectation that a sensible, and at the same time a salutary, reduction may take place in our habitual expenditures. For this purpose those of the civil government, the army, and navy, will need revisal. When we consider that this Government is charged with the external and mutual relations only of these States; that the States themselves have principal care of our persons, our property, and our reputation, constituting the great field of human concerns, we may well doubt whether our organization is not too complicated, too expensive; whether offices and officers have not been multiplied unnecessarily, and sometimes injuriously to the service they were meant to promote. I will cause to be laid before you an essay towards a statement of those who, under public employment of various kinds, draw money from the Treasury, or from our citizens. Time has not permitted a perfect enumeration, the ramifications of office being too multiplied and remote to be completely traced in a first trial. Among those who are dependent on Executive discretion, I have begun the reduction of what was deemed unnecessary. The expenses of diplomatic agency have been considerably diminished. The inspectors of internal revenue, who were found to obstruct the accountability of the institution, have been discontinued. Several agencies, created by Executive authority, on salaries fixed by that also, have been suppressed, and should suggest the expediency of regulating that power by law, so as to subject its exercise to legislative inspection and sanction. Other reformations of the same kind will be pursued with that caution which is requisite, in removing useless things, not to injure what is retained. But the great mass of public offices is established by law, and therefore by law alone can be abolished. Should the Legislature think it expedient to pass this roll in review, and try all its parts by the test of public utility, they may be assured of every aid and light which Executive information can yield. Considering the general tendency to multiply offices and dependencies, and to increase expense to the ultimate term of burden which the citizen can bear, it behooves us to avail ourselves of every occasion which presents itself for taking off the surcharge; that it never may be seen here that, after leaving to labor the smallest portion of its earnings on which it can subsist, Government shall itself consume the whole residue of what it was instituted to guard.

In our care too of the public contributions entrusted to our direction, it would be prudent to multiply barriers against their dissipation, by appropriating specific sums to every specific purpose susceptible of definition; by disallowing all applications of money varying from the appropriation in object, or transcending it in amount; by reducing the undefined field of contingencies, and thereby circumscribing discretionary powers over money; and by bringing back to a single department all accountabilities for money, where the examinations may be prompt, efficacious, and uniform.

An account of the receipts and expenditures of the last year, as prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, will, as usual, be laid before you. The success which has attended the late sales of the public lands shows that, with attention, they may be made an important source of receipt. Among the payments those made in discharge of the principal and interest of the national debt, will show that the public faith has been exactly maintained. To these will be added an estimate of appropriations necessary for the ensuing year. This last will, of course, be affected by such modifications of the system of expense as you shall think proper to adopt.

A statement has been formed by the Secretary of War, on mature consideration, of all the posts and stations where garrisons will be expedient, and of the number of men requisite for each garrison. The whole amount is considerably short of the present Military Establishment. For the surplus no particular use can be pointed out. For defence against invasion their number is as nothing; nor is it conceived needful or safe that a standing army should be kept up in time of peace, for that purpose. Uncertain as we must ever be of the particular point in our circumference where an enemy may choose to invade us, the only force which can be ready at every point, and competent to oppose them, is the body of neighboring citizens, as formed into a militia. On these, collected from the parts most convenient, in numbers proportioned to the invading force, it is best to rely, not only to meet the first attack, but, if it threatens to be permanent, to maintain the defence until regulars may be engaged to relieve them. These considerations render it important that we should, at every session, continue to amend the defects which from time to time show themselves in the laws for regulating the militia, until they are sufficiently perfect: nor should we now, or at any time, separate, until we can say that we have done everything for the militia which we could do were an enemy at our door.

The provision of military stores on hand will be laid before you, that you may judge of the additions still requisite.

With respect to the extent to which our naval preparations should be carried, some difference of opinion may be expected to appear; but just attention to the circumstances of every part of the Union will doubtless reconcile all. A small force will probably continue to be wanted for actual service in the Mediterranean. Whatever annual sum beyond that you may think proper to appropriate to naval preparations, would perhaps be better employed in providing those articles which may be kept without waste or consumption, and be in readiness when any exigence calls them into use. Progress has been made, as will appear by papers now communicated, in providing materials for seventy-four gun ships, as directed by law.

How far the authority given by the Legislature for procuring and establishing sites for naval purposes, has been perfectly understood and pursued in the execution, admits of some doubt. A statement of the expenses already incurred on that subject is now laid before you. I have, in certain cases, suspended or slackened these expenditures, that the Legislature might determine whether so many yards are necessary as have been contemplated. The works at this place are among those permitted to go on; and five of the seven frigates directed to be laid up, have been brought and laid up here, where, besides the safety of their position, they are under the eye of the Executive Administration, as well as of its agents; and where yourselves also will be guided by your own view in the Legislative provisions respecting them, which may, from time to time, be necessary. They are preserved in such condition, as well the vessels as whatever belongs to them, as to be at all times ready for sea on a short warning. Two others are yet to be laid up, so soon as they shall receive the repairs requisite to put them also into sound condition. As a superintending officer will be necessary at each yard, his duties and emoluments, hitherto fixed by the Executive, will be a more proper subject for legislation. A communication will also be made of our progress in the execution of the law respecting the vessels directed to be sold.

The fortifications of our harbors, more or less advanced, present considerations of great difficulty. While some of them are on a scale sufficiently proportioned to the advantages of their position, to the efficacy of their protection, and the importance of the points within it, others are so extensive, will cost so much in their first erection, so much in their maintenance, and require such a force to garrison them, as to make it questionable what is best now to be done. A statement of those commenced or projected; of the expenses already incurred; and estimates of their future cost, as far as can be foreseen, shall be laid before you, that you may be enabled to judge whether any alteration is necessary in the laws respecting this subject.

Agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation, the four pillars of our prosperity, are then most thriving when left most free to individual enterprise. Protection from casual embarrassments, however, may sometimes be seasonably interposed. If, in the course of your observations or inquiries, they should appear to need any aid within the limits of our Constitutional powers, your sense of their importance is a sufficient assurance they will occupy your attention. We cannot, indeed, but all feel an anxious solicitude for the difficulties under which our carrying trade will soon be placed. How far it can be relieved, otherwise than by time, is a subject of important consideration.

The Judiciary system of the United States, and especially that portion of it recently erected, will, of course, present itself to the contemplation of Congress; and that they may be able to judge of the proportion which the institution bears to the business it has to perform, I have caused to be procured from the several States, and now lay before Congress, an exact statement of all the causes decided since the first establishment of the courts, and of those which were depending when additional courts and judges were brought in to their aid.

And while on the Judiciary organization, it will be worthy of your consideration whether the protection of the inestimable institution of juries has been extended to all the cases involving the security of our persons and property. Their impartial selection also being essential to their value, we ought further to consider whether that is sufficiently secured in those States where they are named by a marshal depending on Executive will, or designated by the court, or by officers dependent on them.

I cannot omit recommending a revisal of the laws on the subject of naturalization. Considering the ordinary chances of human life, a denial of citizenship under a residence of fourteen years, is a denial to a great proportion of those who ask it; and controls a policy pursued, from their first settlement, by many of these States, and still believed of consequence to their prosperity. And shall we refuse to the unhappy fugitives from distress that hospitality which the savages of the wilderness extended to our fathers arriving in this land? Shall oppressed humanity find no asylum on this globe? The Constitution, indeed, has wisely provided that, for admission to certain offices of important trust, a residence shall be required sufficient to develop character and design. But might not the general character and capabilities of a citizen be safely communicated to every one manifesting a bona fide purpose of embarking his life and fortunes permanently with us? with restrictions, perhaps, to guard against the fraudulent usurpation of our flag? an abuse which brings so much embarrassment and loss on the genuine citizen, and so much danger to the nation of being involved in war, that no endeavor should be spared to detect and suppress it.

These, fellow-citizens, are the matters respecting the state of the nation which I have thought of importance to be submitted to your consideration at this time. Some others of less moment, or not yet ready for communication, will be the subject of separate Messages. I am happy in this opportunity of committing the arduous affairs of our Government to the collected wisdom of the Union. Nothing shall be wanting on my part to inform, as far as in my power, the Legislative judgment, nor to carry that judgment into faithful execution. The prudence and temperance of your discussions will promote, within your own walls, that conciliation which so much befriends rational conclusion; and by its example will encourage among our constituents that progress of opinion which is tending to unite them in object and in will. That all should be satisfied with any one order of things, is not to be expected; but I indulge the pleasing persuasion that the great body of our citizens will cordially concur in honest and disinterested efforts, which have for their object to preserve the General and State Governments in their Constitutional form and equilibrium; to maintain peace abroad, and order and obedience to the laws at home; to establish principles and practices of administration favorable to the security of liberty and property, and to reduce expenses to what is necessary for the useful purposes of Government.

The Senate proceeded to the appointment of a Chaplain to Congress on their part, and the Rev. Mr. GANTT was elected.

THURSDAY, December 10.

Resolved, That James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper to the Senate, be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ one additional assistant, and two horses, for the purpose of performing such services as are usually required of the Doorkeeper to the Senate; and that the sum of twenty-eight dollars be allowed him weekly for the purpose during the session, and for twenty days after.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have appointed a joint committee on their part for enrolled bills, and desire the appointment of such committee on the part of the Senate.

Resolved, That the Senate do concur in the appointment of a joint committee for enrolled bills, and that Mr. WRIGHT be the committee on the part of the Senate.

FRIDAY, December 11.

JONATHAN MASON, from the State of Massachusetts and JAMES SHEAFE, from the State of New Hampshire, severally attended.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from Samuel Meredith, Treasurer, together with his general, navy, and war accounts, ending 31st December, 1800, 31st March, 30th June, and 30th September, 1801; which were read.

Ordered, That they lie on file.

MONDAY, December 14.

JAMES HILLHOUSE, from the State of Connecticut, and DWIGHT FOSTER, from the State of Massachusetts, severally attended.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have elected the Reverend WILLIAM PARKINSON a Chaplain to Congress, on their part.

TUESDAY, December 15.

The Senate met, but transacted no business.

WEDNESDAY, December 16.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary for the Department of State, with an annual return, ending the 9th instant, containing an abstract of all the returns made by the Collectors of the Customs for the different ports, pursuant to the act for the relief and protection of American seamen, together with abstracts from the communications received from the agents employed in foreign countries for the relief of American seamen; which were read, and ordered to be printed.

A motion was made by Mr. JACKSON, seconded by Mr. NICHOLAS, that it be Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled, That, as a testimony of the high sense they entertain of the nautical skill and gallant conduct of Lieutenant Andrew Sterret, commander of the United States' schooner Enterprize, manifested in an engagement with, and in the capture of, a Tripolitan corsair of superior force, in the Mediterranean sea, fitted out by the Bey of that Regency to harass the trade, capture the vessels, and enslave the citizens of these States: the President of the United States be requested to present Lieutenant Sterret with a sword, with such suitable devices thereon as he shall deem proper, and emblematic of that heroic action; and the mercy extended to a barbarous enemy, who three times struck his colors, and twice recommenced hostilities—an act of humanity, however unmerited, highly honorable to the American flag and nation: and that the President of the United States be also requested to present Lieutenant Lane of the marines, who was with a detachment of that corps, serving on board the Enterprize in that engagement, and contributed, by his and his detachment's gallant conduct, to the success of the day, with a medal, with such suitable devices as the President may deem fit.

Be it further resolved, In consideration of the intrepid behaviour of the crew of the Enterprize, under the orders of their gallant commander, and their receiving no prize money, the corsair being dismantled and released after her capture, that one month's pay over and above the usual allowance, be paid to all the other officers, sailors, and marines, who were actually on board and engaged in that action; for the expenditure of which charge Congress will make the necessary appropriation.

And it was agreed that this motion lie for consideration.

Mr. COCKE presented the petition of Daniel Fox, a soldier of the militia, under the command of General Sevier, in the year 1793, rendered incapable of labor by a nervous complaint, contracted in an expedition against the Cherokee Indians; and praying relief. The petition was read.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. COCKE, ELLERY, and NICHOLAS, to consider and report thereon.

On motion, it was agreed, that the Message of the President of the United States, of the 8th instant, be made the order of the day for to-morrow, to be considered as in a Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from SIMON WILLARD, to the Secretary of the Senate, on the subject of compensation for an eight-day clock, purchased by order of the 25th of February last, for the use of the Senate Chamber; which was read and referred to Messrs. JACKSON, J. MASON, and T. FOSTER, to consider and report thereon.

WEDNESDAY, December 23.

A message from the House of Representatives, informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill extending the privilege of franking letters to the delegate from the Mississippi Territory, and making provision for his compensation, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Agreeably to notice yesterday given, Mr. ANDERSON obtained leave to bring in a bill authorizing the discharge of Laurance Erb from his confinement; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. COCKE, from the committee to whom was re-committed, on the 18th instant, the petition of Daniel Fox, made a further report; which was read and ordered to lie for consideration.

The following Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate,
and of the House of Representatives:*

I now enclose sundry documents supplementary to those communicated to you with my Message at the commencement of the session. Two others, of considerable importance, the one relating to our transactions with the Barbary Powers, the other presenting a view of the offices of the Government, shall be communicated as soon as they can be completed.

Dec. 22, 1801.

TH: JEFFERSON.

*Gentlemen of the Senate,
and of the House of Representatives:*

Another return of the census of the State of Maryland is just received from the Marshal of that State, which he desires may be substituted as more correct than the one first returned by him and communicated by me to Congress. This new return, with his letter, is now laid before you.

Dec. 23, 1801.

TH: JEFFERSON.

The Message and papers therein referred to were read, and severally ordered to lie for consideration.

THURSDAY, December 24.

The bill authorizing the discharge of Laurance Erb from his confinement was read the second time, and committed to Messrs. ANDERSON, TRACY, and BRADLEY, to consider and report thereon.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Postmaster General, in obedience to the "Act to establish the Post Office;" which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, extending the privilege of franking letters to the delegate from the Mississippi Territory, and making provision for his compensation, was read the second time, and the further consideration thereof postponed until Monday next.

TUESDAY, December 29.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business.

WEDNESDAY, December 30.

Mr. TRACY gave notice that he should, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill to carry into effect the appropriations of land in the purchase of the Ohio company, in the Northwestern Territory, for the support of schools and religion, and for other purposes.

THURSDAY, December 31.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE presented the petition of Isaac Zane, stating that he was made a prisoner at the age of nine years by the Wyandot Indians, with whom he remained until he became of age; had a family by a woman of that nation, and a tract of land was assigned him by the said nation, on a branch of the Great Miami, and which tract of land was ceded to the United States by a recent treaty with the said Wyandot Indians, and praying such relief as may be deemed equitable; and the petition was read, and committed to Messrs. BRECKENRIDGE, TRACY, and OGDEN, to consider and report thereon.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House disagree to the resolutions of the Senate respecting the books and maps purchased pursuant to a resolution of Congress of the 24th of April, 1800. They have passed a bill concerning the library for the use of both Houses of Congress, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was twice read by unanimous consent, and committed to Messrs. TRACY, LOGAN, and DAYTON, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate took into consideration the motion made on the 16th instant respecting Lieutenant Sterret, commander of the United States schooner Enterprize; which motion was amended and agreed to, and sundry resolutions adopted accordingly.

MONDAY, January 4, 1802.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE notified the Senate that he should, on Wednesday next, move for the order of the day on that part of the Message of the President of the United States of the 8th of December last, which respects the judiciary system.

TUESDAY, January 5.

Mr. BROWN, from the State of Kentucky, attended.

REPORTING THE DEBATES.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter signed Samuel H. Smith, stating that he was desirous of taking notes of the proceedings of the Senate, in such manner as to render them correct: Whereupon,

Resolved, That any stenographer desirous to take the debates of the Senate on Legislative business, may be admitted for that purpose, at such place within the area of the Senate Chamber as the President may allot:

And, on motion to reconsider the above resolution, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 17, nays 9.

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Breckenridge, Cocke, Dayton, Ellery, Dwight Foster, Hillhouse, Howard, Logan, Jonathan Mason, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, Sumter, Tracy, White, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Brown, Chipman, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Nicholas, Sheafe, and Stone.

On motion, to amend the resolution, by adding, after the word stenographer, "He having given bond in the sum of —, with two sufficient sureties, in the sum of — each, for his good conduct," it passed in the negative—yeas 10, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chipman, Dayton, Dwight Foster, Hillhouse, Howard, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, Sheafe, and Tracy.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Colhoun, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, J. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, White, and Wright.

On motion, to agree to the original resolution, amended by adding the words "or note-taker," after the words stenographer, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 16, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Colhoun, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Chipman, Dayton, Dwight Foster, Hillhouse, Howard, J. Mason, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, Sheafe, Tracy, and White.

So it was Resolved, That any stenographer, or note-taker, desirous to take the debates of the Senate on Legislative business, may be admitted for that purpose at such place, within the area of the Senate Chamber, as the President shall allot.*

[From the National Intelligencer of Jan. 8, 1802.]

* On Monday last the editor addressed a letter to the President of the Senate, requesting permission to occupy a position in the lower area of the Senate Chamber, for the purpose of taking with correctness the debates and proceedings of that body.

It may be necessary to remark that heretofore no stenographer has been admitted in this area; and the upper gallery, being open to the admission of every one, and very remote from the floor of the House, has prevented any attempt being made to take the debates, from the impossibility of hearing distinctly from it.

The contents of the letter were submitted by the President to the Senate; and a resolution agreed to, to the following effect: Resolved, That any stenographer, desirous to take the debates of the Senate on Legislative business, may be admitted for that purpose, at such

JANUARY, 1802.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter signed William Doughty, clerk, with the general account of the late Treasurer of the United States, to the 30th of September, 1801; which was read, and ordered to lie on file.

WEDNESDAY, January 6.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the President's Message, delivered at the commencement of the session. Agreed to.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

Mr. MASON called for the reading of the Message, which was in part read; when the further reading of the whole document was suspended, and that part only read, which relates to the Judiciary System.

Upon which Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, from Kentucky, rose, and stated that two days ago he had given notice that on this day he would submit to the consideration of the Senate two resolutions respecting the Judiciary Establishment of the United States. As, however, those resolutions were not necessarily connected, and as they might be distinctly discussed, he would at present confine himself to moving the first resolution; without however foreclosing to himself the right of submitting the second after the disposition of the first. He, therefore, moved that the act passed last session respecting the Judiciary Establishment of the United States, be repealed.

The motion was seconded by Mr. MASON.

After the resolution was read by the PRESIDENT,

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE said he did not desire to place, within the area of the Senate Chamber, as the President shall allot.

Whereupon, a motion was made to reconsider the above resolution, and agreed to. The yeas and nays being taken, which were—yeas 17, nays 9.

It was then moved to amend the resolution by adding after the word "stenographer," "he having given bond in the sum of —, with two sufficient sureties in the sum of — each, for his good conduct."

On which the yeas and nays were called, and stood—yeas 10, nays 18.

It was then moved to agree to the original resolution amended, by adding the words, "or note-taker" after the word "stenographer;" which passed in the affirmative. The yeas and nays being required were—yeas 16, nays 12.

On Wednesday the editor had, accordingly, assigned to him a convenient place in the lower area, from which he took notes of the proceedings of the Senate.

On the adoption of the above resolution, which opens a new door to public information, and which may be considered as the prelude to a more genuine sympathy between the Senate and the people of the United States, than may have heretofore subsisted, by rendering each better acquainted with the other, we congratulate, without qualification, every friend to the true principles of our republican institutions.

precipitate a vote on the question. But, having given notice two days since of his intention to move this resolution, he was himself prepared, if other gentlemen were prepared, to offer his sentiments on the subject. But if this were not the case; if gentlemen were not prepared to enter into a discussion of a point of such importance, he was not anxious for immediate consideration.

Mr. TRACY observed that the ordinary mode of procedure in Senate had been to refer, in the first instance, each substantive member of the President's Message to a select committee. But though this was the usual course, yet he felt in no way hostile to any mode of doing business, which should be most agreeable to the gentleman from Kentucky, or to the House. With an adherence to the ordinary course, he would have been better pleased, for the substantial reason, that by a reference of the subject to a select committee, on receiving a report, the minds of the House would be drawn more precisely to the points involved in it, than could be expected from a resolution so loose as the present, which could only give rise to verbal discussions.

Another course of procedure had not been unusual—that of obtaining leave to bring in a bill, in which event, the same result desired by Mr. TRACY would be insured, viz: the reference of the bill to a committee.

Mr. S. T. MASON differed from the gentleman from Connecticut. He believed the mode, now pursued, was perfectly correct, and conformable to a principle adopted this session, that the Senate was to be considered as in a committee of the whole on the President's Message, whenever taken up. Nor did he discern the necessity, in a body so select as this, of referring each subject to a select committee. But as the subject is extremely important, and some gentlemen seemed unprepared for the discussion, he moved its postponement till Friday.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE said, that though he had given notice, in his opinion sufficient, of his purpose, yet, not wishing a precipitate discussion, he would agree to the desired delay.

The consideration of the resolution was then deferred to Friday next.

THURSDAY, January 7.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill for the apportionment of representatives among the several States, according to the second enumeration, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, a second time.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. LOGAN, NICHOLAS, ELLERY, JACKSON, and STONE, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee to whom was referred the bill concerning the library for the use of both Houses of Congress, reported amendments; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 8.

The PRESIDENT read a letter addressed to him, and signed Thomas Tingey, and others, the vestry of Washington parish, in behalf of themselves and the other members of that church, soliciting the use of the room in the Capitol now occupied by the Court, as a place of worship on Sundays, during the inclemency of Winter.

Mr. LOGAN, from the committee, reported the bill for the apportionment of representatives among the several States, according to the second enumeration, without amendment; and it was agreed that the further consideration of this bill should be postponed to Monday next.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the motion made on the 6th instant, to wit:

"That the act of Congress passed on the 13th day of February, 1801, entitled 'An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the Courts of the United States,' ought to be repealed."

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE then rose and addressed the President, as follows:

It will be expected of me, I presume, sir, as I introduced the resolution now under consideration, to assign my reasons for wishing a repeal of this law. This I shall do; and shall endeavor to show,

1. That the law is unnecessary and improper, and was so at its passage; and
2. That the courts and judges created by it, can and ought to be abolished.

1st. That the act under consideration was unnecessary and improper, is, to my mind, no difficult task to prove. No increase of courts or judges could be necessary or justifiable, unless the existing courts and judges were incompetent to the prompt and proper discharge of the duties consigned to them. To hold out a show of litigation, when in fact little exists, must be impolitic; and to multiply expensive systems, and create hosts of expensive officers, without having experienced an actual necessity for them, must be a wanton waste of the public treasure.

The document before us shows that, at the passage of this act, the existing courts, not only from their number, but from the suits depending before them, were fully competent to a speedy decision of those suits. It shows, that on the 15th day of June last, there were depending in all the circuit courts, (that of Maryland only excepted, whose docket we have not been furnished with,) one thousand five hundred and thirty-nine suits. It shows that eight thousand two hundred and seventy-six suits of every description have come before those courts, in ten years and upwards. From this it appears, that the annual average amount of suits has been about eight hundred.

But sundry contingent things have conspired to swell the circuit court dockets. In Maryland, Virginia, and in all the Southern and Southwestern States, a great number of suits have been brought by British creditors; this species of controversy is nearly at an end.

In Pennsylvania, the docket has been swelled by prosecutions in consequence of the Western insurrection, by the disturbances in Bucks and Northampton counties; and by the sedition act. These I find amount in that State to two hundred and forty suits.

In Kentucky, non-resident land claimants have gone into the federal court from a temporary convenience: because, until within a year or two past, there existed no court of general jurisdiction co-extensive with the whole State. I find, too, that of the six hundred and odd suits which have been commenced there, one hundred and ninety-six of them have been prosecutions under the laws of the United States.

In most of the States there have been prosecutions under the sedition act. This source of litigation is, I trust, forever dried up. And, lastly, in all the States a number of suits have arisen under the excise law; which source of controversy will, I hope, before this session terminates, be also dried up.

But this same document discloses another important fact; which is, that notwithstanding all these untoward and temporary sources of federal adjudication, the suits in those courts are decreasing; for, from the dockets exhibited (except Kentucky and Tennessee, whose suits are summed up in the aggregate) it appears, that in 1799 there were one thousand two hundred and seventy-four, and in 1800 there were six hundred and eighty-seven suits commenced; showing a decrease of five hundred and eighty-seven suits.

Could it be necessary then to increase courts when suits were decreasing? Could it be necessary to multiply judges, when their duties were diminishing? And will I not be justified, therefore, in affirming, that the law was unnecessary, and that Congress acted under a mistaken impression, when they multiplied courts and judges at a time when litigation was actually decreasing?

But, sir, the decrease of business goes a small way in fixing my opinion on this subject. I am inclined to think, that so far from there having been a necessity at this time for an increase of courts and judges, that the time never will arrive when America will stand in need of thirty-eight federal judges. Look, sir, at your Constitution, and see the judicial power there consigned to federal courts, and seriously ask yourself, can there be fairly extracted from those powers subjects of litigation sufficient for six supreme and thirty-two inferior court judges? To me it appears impossible.

The judicial powers given to the federal courts were never intended by the Constitution to embrace, exclusively, subjects of litigation, which could, with propriety, be left with the State courts. Their jurisdiction was intended principally to extend to great national and foreign concerns. Except cases arising under the laws of the United States, I do not at present recollect but three or four kinds in which their power extends to subjects of litigation, in which private persons only are concerned. And can it be possible, that with a jurisdiction embracing so small a portion of private litigation, in a great part of which the State courts might, and ought to participate, that we can stand in need of thirty-eight judges, and expend in judiciary regulations the annual sum of $137,000?

No other country, whose regulations I have any knowledge of, furnishes an example of a system so prodigal and extensive. In England, whose courts are the boast, and said to be the security of the rights of the nation, every man knows there are but twelve judges and three principal courts. These courts embrace, in their original or appellate jurisdiction, almost the whole circle of human concerns.

The King's Bench and Common Pleas, which consist of four judges each, entertain all the common law suits of 40s. and upwards, originating among nine millions of the most commercial people in the world. They moreover revise the proceedings of not only all the petty courts of record in the Kingdom, even down to the courts of piepoudre, but also of the Court of King's Bench in Ireland; and these supreme courts, after centuries of experiment, are found to be fully competent to all the business of the Kingdom.

I will now inquire into the power of Congress to put down these additional courts and judges.

First, as to the courts, Congress are empowered by the Constitution "from time to time, to ordain and establish inferior courts." The act now under consideration, is a legislative construction of this clause in the Constitution, that Congress may abolish as well as create these judicial officers; because it does expressly, in the twenty-seventh section of the act, abolish the then existing inferior courts, for the purpose of making way for the present. This construction, I contend, is correct; but it is equally pertinent to my object, whether it be or be not. If it be correct, then the present inferior courts may be abolished as constitutionally as the last; if it be not, then the law for abolishing the former courts, and establishing the present, was unconstitutional, and consequently repealable.

But independent of this legislative construction, on which I do not found my opinion, nor mean to rely my argument, there is little doubt indeed, in my mind, as to the power of Congress on this law. The first section of the third article vests the judicial power of the United States in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. By this clause Congress may, from time to time, establish inferior courts; but it is clearly a discretionary power, and they may not establish them. The language of the Constitution is very different when regulations are not left discretionary. For example, "The trial," says the Constitution, "of all crimes (except in cases of impeachment) shall be by jury: representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned according to numbers. All revenue bills shall originate in the House of Representatives," &c. It would, therefore, in my opinion, be a perversion, not only of language, but of intellect, to say, that although Congress may, from time to time, establish inferior courts, yet, when established, that they shall not be abolished by a subsequent Congress possessing equal powers. It would be a paradox in legislation.

2d. As to the judges. The Judiciary department is so constructed as to be sufficiently secured against the improper influence of either the Executive or Legislative departments. The courts are organized and established by the Legislature, and the Executive creates the judges. Being thus organized, the Constitution affords the proper checks to secure their honesty and independence in office. It declares they shall not be removed from office during good behaviour; nor their salaries diminished during their continuance in office. From this it results, that a judge, after his appointment, is totally out of the power of the President, and his salary secured against legislative diminution, during his continuance in office. The first of these checks, which protects a judge in his office during good behaviour, applies to the President only, who would otherwise have possessed the power of removing him, like all other officers, at pleasure; and the other check, forbidding a diminution of their salaries, applies to the Legislature only. They are two separate and distinct checks, furnished by the Constitution against two distinct departments of the Government; and they are the only ones which are or ought to have been furnished on the subject.

But because the Constitution declares that a judge shall hold his office during good behaviour, can it be tortured to mean, that he shall hold his office after it is abolished? Can it mean, that his tenure should be limited by behaving well in an office which did not exist? Can it mean that an office may exist, although its duties are extinct? Can it mean, in short, that the shadow, to wit, the judge, can remain, when the substance, to wit, the office, is removed? It must have intended all these absurdities, or it must admit a construction which will avoid them.

The construction obviously is, that a judge should hold an existing office, so long as he did his duty in that office; and not that he should hold an office that did not exist, and perform duties not provided by law. Had the construction which I contend against been contemplated by those who framed the Constitution, it would have been necessary to have declared, explicitly, that the judges should hold their offices and their salaries during good behaviour.

Such a construction is not only irreconcilable with reason and propriety, but is repugnant to the principles of the Constitution. It is a principle of our Constitution, as well as of common honesty, that no man shall receive public money but in consideration of public services. Sinecure offices, therefore, are not permitted by our laws or Constitution. By this construction, complete sinecure offices will be created; hosts of Constitutional pensioners will be settled on us, and we cannot calculate how long. This is really creating a new species of public debt, not like any other of our debts; we cannot discharge the principal at any fixed time. It is worse than the deferred stock; for on that you pay an annual interest only, and the principal is redeemable at a given period. But here, you pay an annual principal, and that principal irredeemable except by the will of Providence. It may suit countries where public debts are considered as public blessings; for in this way a people might soon become superlatively blessed indeed.

Let me not be told, sir, that the salaries in the present case are inconsiderable, and ought not to be withheld; and that the doctrine is not a dangerous one. I answer, it is the principle I contend against; and if it is heterodox for one dollar, it is equally so for a million. But I contend the principle, if once admitted, may be extended to destructive lengths. Suppose it should hereafter happen, that those in power should combine to provide handsomely for their friends, could any way so plain, easy, and effectual, present itself, as by creating courts, and filling them with those friends? Might not sixty as well as sixteen, with salaries of twenty thousand, instead of two thousand dollars, be provided for in this way?

The thing, I trust, will not happen. It is presuming a high degree of corruption; but it might happen under the construction contended for; as the Constitution presumes corruption may happen in any department of the Government, by the checks it has furnished against it; and as this construction does open a wide door for corruption, it is but fair reasoning to show the dangers which may grow out of it; for, in the construction of all instruments, that which will lead to inconvenience, mischief, or absurdity, ought to be avoided. This doctrine has another difficulty to reconcile: After the law is repealed, they are either judges or they are not. If they are judges they can be impeached; but for what? For malfeasance in office only. How, I would ask, can they be impeached for malfeasances in office, when their offices are abolished? They are not officers, but still they are entitled to the emoluments annexed to an office. Although they are judges, they cannot be guilty of malfeasances, because they have no office. They are only quasi judges so far as regards the duties, but real judges so far as regards the salary. It must be the salary, then, and not the duties which constitute a judge. For my part, I do not know under what class of things to range them, or what name to give them. They are unacknowledged by the letter, spirit, or genius, of our Constitution, and are to me non-descripts.

There is another difficulty under this construction still to encounter, and which also grows out of the Constitution: By the Constitution, a new State may be formed by the junction of two or more States, with their assent and that of Congress. If this doctrine, once a judge and always a judge, be correct, what would you do in such an event, with the district judges of the States who formed that junction? Both would be unnecessary, and you would have, in a single State, two judges of equal and concurrent jurisdiction; or one a real judge, with an office, and another a quasi judge, without an office. The States also forming such junction, would be equally embarrassed with their State judges; for the same construction would be equally applicable to them.

Upon this construction, also, an infallibility is predicated, which it would be arrogance in any human institution to assume, and which goes to cut up legislation by the roots. We would be debarred from that which is indulged to us from a higher source, and on subjects of higher concern than legislation; I mean a retraction from and correction of our errors. On all other subjects of legislation we are allowed, it seems, to change our minds, except on judiciary subjects, which, of all others, is the most complex and difficult. I appeal to our own statute book to prove this difficulty; for in ten years Congress have passed no less than twenty-six laws on this subject.

I conceive, sir, that the tenure by which a judge holds his office, is evidently bottomed on the idea of securing his honesty and independence, whilst exercising his office. The idea was introduced in England, to counteract the influence of the Crown over the judges; but if the construction now contended for shall prevail, we shall, in our mistaken imitation of this our favorite prototype, outstrip them, by establishing what they have not, a judicial oligarchy; for there their judges are removable by a joint vote of Lords and Commons. Here ours are not removable, except for malfeasance in office; which malfeasance could not be committed, as they would have no office.

Upon the whole, sir, as all courts under any free Government must be created with an eye to the administration of justice only; and not with any regard to the advancement or emolument of individual men; as we have undeniable evidence before us that the creation of the courts now under consideration was totally unnecessary; and as no Government can, I apprehend, seriously deny that this Legislature has a right to repeal a law enacted by a preceding one, we will, in any event, discharge our duty by repealing this law; and thereby doing all in our power to correct the evil. If the judges are entitled to their salaries under the Constitution, our repeal will not affect them; and they will, no doubt, resort to their proper remedy. For where there is a Constitutional right, there must be a Constitutional remedy.

Mr. OLCOTT, of New Hampshire, thought the subject was of so much importance as to merit further consideration. The arguments of the gentleman from Kentucky, however ingenious, had not convinced him that the law ought to be repealed. It had not risen like a mushroom in the night, but the principles on which it rested had been settled after mature reflection. He thought it would be extraordinary, before any inconvenience had been discovered, to set such a law aside. For these reasons, Mr. O. moved the postponement of the consideration of the question.

Mr. COCKE, of Tennessee.—This act is said to be entirely experimental, and it is further said, that no inconveniences had arisen under it. He thought serious inconveniences had arisen. The inconvenience of paying $137,000 a year was truly serious; and it was an inconvenience which ought to be got rid of as soon as possible. It was expected that gentlemen opposed to the resolution would come forward with their arguments against it. If, however, they had no arguments to use, he thought his friend from Kentucky had brought forward reasons so cogent and experimental that the House must be convinced of the propriety of the repeal.

Mr. DAYTON, of New Jersey, trusted it was not the disposition of the mover to press a decision to-day. He thought it would be improper to postpone the discussion, as gentlemen would thereby be precluded from offering their opinions on the subject. He hoped the motion for postponement would be withdrawn, that other gentlemen might have an opportunity to speak.

The motion was withdrawn.

Mr. J. MASON, of Massachusetts, said, it would be agreed on all hands that this was one of the most important questions that ever came before a Legislature. Were he not of this opinion he would not have risen to offer his sentiments. But he felt so deep an interest in the question, and from the respect which he entertained for the district of country he represented, he deemed it his duty to meet the subject, and not be satisfied with giving to it his silent negative.

It was well known, and he presumed it would be readily agreed to, that no people on earth, for the last twenty-four years, had been so much in the habit of forming systems of government as the people of the United States. Nor had any people been so fortunately situated for cool and correct deliberation. In the Constitutions they had formed, it would appear that there had been an uniform concurrence in the establishment of one great prominent feature, and also in the application of one uniform principle to that feature: that the Legislative, the Executive, and the Judicial, should form the three great departments of Government, and that they should be distinct from and independent of each other; and the more the proceedings and sentiments of the people were examined, the more clearly would it appear that all the new and additional checks created, had been applied to adjust the relative weakness or strength of the several departments of Government. The same principle had been observed in the old world, whenever an opportunity presented for forming a constitution, having for its object, the protection of individual rights. It accorded, too, with the uniform opinions of the most celebrated historians and politicians, both of Europe and America; with the opinions and practices of all our Legislatures. Nor had Mr. MASON ever heard any one hardy enough to deny the propriety of its observance.

He well recollected, that among the great grievances, which had roused us into an assertion of our independence of England, it was declared in the instrument asserting that independence, "that the Crown had the appointment of judges dependent on its will and favor."

From all these circumstances he concluded that the people of America, when they formed a system for their Federal Government, intended to establish this great principle; and the conclusion would be confirmed by an examination of the Constitution, which in every section recognised or referred to it.

The Constitution, in the construction of the Executive, Legislative, and Judiciary departments, had assigned to each a different tenure. The President was chosen for four years; the Senate for six years, subject to a prescribed rotation biennially; the House of Representatives for two years; and the Judiciary during good behaviour. It says to the President, at the expiration of every four years, you shall revert to the character of a private citizen, however splendid your talents or conspicuous your virtue. Why? Because you have assigned to you powers which it is dangerous to exercise. You have the power of creating offices and officers. You have prerogatives. The temptation to an abuse of your power is great. Such has been the uniform experience of ages. The Constitution holds the same language to the Senate and House of Representatives: It says, it is necessary for the good of society that you also should revert at short periods to the mass of the people, because to you are consigned the most important duties of Government, and because you hold the purse-strings of the nation.

To the Judiciary: What is the language applied to them? The judges are not appointed for two, four, or any given number of years; but they hold their appointments for life, unless they misbehave themselves. Why? For this reason: They are not the depositaries of the high prerogatives of Government. They neither appoint to office, or hold the purse-strings of the country, or legislate for it. They depend entirely upon their talents, which is all they have to recommend them. They cannot, therefore, be disposed to pervert their power to improper purposes. What are their duties? To expound and apply the laws. To do this, with fidelity and skill, requires a length of time. The requisite knowledge is not to be procured in a day. These are the plain and strong reasons which must strike every mind, for the different tenure by which the judges hold their offices, and they are such as will eternally endure wherever liberty exists.

On examination, it will be found that the people, in forming their Constitution, meant to make the judges as independent of the Legislature as of the Executive. Because the duties which they have to perform, call upon them to expound not only the laws, but the Constitution also; in which is involved the power of checking the Legislature in case it should pass any laws in violation of the Constitution. For this reason it was more important that the judges in this country should be placed beyond the control of the Legislature, than in other countries where no such power attaches to them.

Mr. MASON challenged gentlemen to exhibit a single instance, besides that lately furnished by Maryland, of a Legislative act, repealing a law passed in execution of a Constitution, under which the judges held their offices during good behaviour. In truth, no such power existed, nor was it in the power of any Legislature, so circumstanced, by a single law to dash them out of existence.

The opinion of Mr. MASON, therefore, was, that this Legislature have no right to repeal the judiciary law; for such an act would be in direct violation of the Constitution.

The Constitution says: "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services, a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

Thus it says, "the judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour." How can this direction of the Constitution be complied with, if the Legislature shall, from session to session, repeal the law under which the office is held, and remove the office? He did not conceive that any words, which human ingenuity could devise, could more completely get over the remarks that had been made by the gentleman from Kentucky. But that gentleman says, that this provision of the Constitution applies exclusively to the President. He considers it as made to supersede the powers of the President to remove the judges. But could this have been the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution, when even the right of the President to remove officers at pleasure, was a matter of great doubt, and had divided in opinion our most enlightened citizens. Not that he stated this circumstance because he had doubts. He thought the President ought to have the right; but it did not emanate from the Constitution; was not expressly found in the Constitution, but sprang from Legislative construction.

Besides, if Congress have the right to repeal the whole of the law, they must possess the right to repeal a section of it. If so, they may repeal the law so far as it applies to a particular district, and thus get rid of an obnoxious judge. They may remove his office from him. Would it not be absurd still to say, that the removed judge held his office during good behaviour?

The Constitution says: "The judges shall, at stated times, receive for their services, a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office." Why this provision? Why guard against the power to deprive the judges of their pay in a diminution of it; and not provide against what was more important, their existence?

Mr. MASON knew that a Legislative body was occasionally subject to the dominance of violent passions; he knew that they might pass unconstitutional laws; and that the judges, sworn to support the Constitution, would refuse to carry them into effect; and he knew that the Legislature might contend for the execution of their statutes: Hence the necessity of placing the judges above the influence of these passions; and for these reasons the Constitution had put them out of the power of the Legislature.

Still, if the gentlemen would not agree with him as to the unconstitutionality of the measure proposed, he would ask, was it expedient? Were there not great doubts existing throughout the United States? Ought not each gentleman to say, though I may have no doubts or hesitancy, are not a large portion of our citizens of opinion that it would violate the Constitution? If this diversity of sentiment exists, ought not the evils under the judiciary law to be very great before we touch it? Ought we not to aim at harmonizing, instead of dividing our citizens? Was not the Constitution a sacred instrument; an instrument ever to be approached with reverence; an instrument which ought not lightly to be drawn from its hallowed retreat, and subjected to the flux and reflux of passion? But where is the evil complained of? This system was established only last session; scarcely had it been yet organized; scarcely had we tried it on its very threshold; where then the necessity of being so pointed, as to destroy a system scarcely formed three days ago? Does not this manifest precipitation? Will it not manifest more magnanimity, more rationality, to abide by it until we try it; instead of taking up a pen and dashing it out of existence?

The reason that the suits depending were not so numerous, arose from the nature of the old establishment. That establishment had no parallel. It carried with it the seeds of its own dissolution. No set of judges could be found physically hardy enough to execute it. Such was the labor of their duties, that they were denied time for study or improvement. Besides, a case was heard at one term by one judge, and postponed for consideration to the next term. At that term another judge appeared, and all the arguments were to be gone over anew, and the same thing might happen again and again. Was this the way to extend justice to our citizens? Was not the delay equivalent to a denial of justice? It was a fact that three-fourths of the time of the judges had been taken up in travelling.

It may be true, that the number of suits in the federal courts is lessened; and if the internal taxes are to be swept away, it may be still more lessened as far as depends upon that source. But is it possible, that suits will go on diminishing as the gentleman seems to think? Is reason so predominant? Is the millenium so near at hand? On the contrary, is not our commerce increasing with great rapidity? Is not our wealth increasing? And will not controversies arise in proportion to the growth of our numbers and property? controversies, which will go to the federal tribunals, as soon as the judiciary system is fully established?

By the documents quoted by the gentleman from Kentucky, it appears that more business has been lately done in the federal courts than in any other antecedent time, except in one or two counties in Pennsylvania.

Besides, said Mr. M. even if there be not a great pressure of business, had we not better pay the paltry sum of thirty or forty thousand dollars for a system too broad, than have one that is too narrow?

Is it not a melancholy consideration, that in many of the European States, the costs are equal to the principle contended for? It would be honorable to the United States to exhibit a different example. It would be honorable to them to hold out an example, even if confined to foreigners, of prompt and efficacious justice, though at the expense of $100,000. Such an example would be a cause for national triumph, and our people would exult in it.

Inasmuch, therefore, as to render the judges respectable, it was necessary to make their appointments permanent; as time, labor, experience, and long study, were required to perfect any man in a knowledge of the laws of his country; inasmuch as it has been thought good policy, that the judges should be well paid, and that they should be so placed as to be divested of all fear, and neither to look to the right nor left; inasmuch as they should be so placed as to render them independent of Legislative as well as of Executive power; he hoped this law would not be repealed.

These were the reasons which Mr. M. assigned as those which would influence his decision. He acknowledged, that he had not entered the House prepared to offer his sentiments; but, as the question was about to be put, he had thought it best to offer them, such as they were, rather than to give a silent vote on a subject of such great importance.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, said it must be agreed that the subject was one of great importance, from its effect upon our revenues. If the repeal of the act of last session was Constitutional, he presumed there could be little doubt of its expediency, from the documents on our table. Has the Constitution vested the Legislature with a power over the subject of the resolution? If so, then should a law, which had been the effect of a flux of passion, be repealed by a reflux of reason. He believed that it had been introduced at the period of an expiring administration. It had been resisted by the republican side of the Senate, and he trusted that now, on the return of reason, it would be repealed.

An allusion has been made to the State of Maryland, which had repealed a law respecting the judiciary. Mr. W. here quoted the constitution of that State, whose provisions, he observed, so far as respected the tenure of the office of a judge, corresponded with those of the Constitution of the United States. The Legislature of that State had been of opinion, and correctly too, that they did possess the power of repealing a law formed by their predecessors. And the Legislature of the United States possessed the same power. This they had already determined by the very act of the last session, which, while it created a number of new judges, abolished the offices of several district judges.

It was clear that the Constitution meant to guard the officer and not the office. Will it be said that what the Legislature makes to-day, cannot be annihilated to-morrow? Even as to the judges of the Supreme Court, had not the law first constituted six, and was it not now by law reduced to five? And if Congress has power to reduce the number of the superior, have they not the same power to reduce the number of the inferior judges? Are we to be eternally bound by the follies of a law which ought never to have been passed?

Why the expression in the Constitution, "The judicial power shall be vested in such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish," if it had been intended, as is now contended, that the office being once bestowed, no change can be made?

If the case of those who have accepted those offices, be considered as a hard one, may it not be said that they knew the Constitution, and the tenure by which their offices were to be held? In our regard for individual interest, we ought not to sacrifice the great interests of our country; and was it not demonstrable that, if twenty-one judges were sufficient when twelve hundred suits existed, they were equally so when there were no more than seven hundred?

The gentleman from Massachusetts was wrong in stating that Maryland was the only State that had repealed a law creating judiciary offices. Virginia, if he was not misinformed, had done the same thing. But he wanted not these precedents. Our own archives furnished us with abundant precedents. We had reduced the judges of the Supreme Court from six to five; we had annihilated two districts. The very gentlemen opposed now to the repeal of this law, had voted for these measures. Thus it appeared, that, though the Constitution justified the measure then, it prohibited it now!

Believing the Judiciary law of the last session had arisen from a disposition to provide for the warm friends of the existing Administration; believing that great inconveniences had arisen under it; believing its expense to be oppressive; and believing that if one Legislature had a right to pass it, another Legislature had the same right to repeal it; he trusted that, however a preceding Legislature might have been governed by passion, the present Legislature would, by repealing it, show that they were governed by reason.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York.—Mr. President, I am so very unfortunate, that the arguments in favor of the motion have confirmed my opinion that the law to which it refers ought not to be repealed. The honorable mover has rested his proposition on two grounds:

1st. That the Judiciary law passed last session is unnecessary; and, 2dly. That we have a right to repeal it, and ought to exercise that right.

The numerical mode of argument made use of to establish his first point is perfectly novel, and commands my tribute of admiration. This is the first time I ever heard the utility of the courts of justice estimated by the number of suits carried before them. I have read that a celebrated monarch of England, the great Alfred, had enacted such laws, established such tribunals, and organized such a system of police, that a purse of gold might be hung up on the highway without any danger of being taken. Had the honorable gentleman from Kentucky existed in those days, he would, perhaps, have attempted to convince old Alfred that what he considered as the glory of his reign was its greatest evil. For, by taking the unfrequency of crimes as a proof that tribunals were unnecessary, and thus boldly substituting effect for cause, the gentleman might demonstrate the inutility of any institution by a system of reasoning the most fallacious.

But, sir, if, with that poor measure of ability which it has pleased God to give me, I march on that ground which I have been accustomed to deem solid, I should say that, in so far as the terror of our Judicial institutions prevented the perpetration of crimes, in that same degree are those institutions useful. This would be my mode of reasoning, but for the wonderful discovery made by the honorable mover of the resolution.

We have been told of the great expense of the Judiciary—that it amounted to $137,000. And thus attributing the whole expense of the establishment to this particular law, it has been assumed in argument that to repeal the law would save $137,000. If the other arithmetical arguments of the gentleman were equally incorrect, his inferences will be entitled to but little attention.

Of this sum, it appears, from a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that $45,000 are for the contingent expenses of jurors, witnesses, &c., which serves in some measure to show that it is expected much business will be actually done.

The expense arising under this law, that it is proposed to repeal, amounts to thirty thousand dollars, exclusive of fifteen thousand dollars estimated for contingent expenses, making, together, forty-five thousand dollars. But let us not stint the allowance; throw in a few thousand more, and let the whole be stated at fifty-one thousand; apportion this sum among the people of the United States, according to the census lately taken, and you will find that each individual will pay just one cent. And for this insignificant saving of a cent a man, we are called upon to give up all that is valuable to a nation.

One of the great purposes of a Government is to secure the people from foreign invasion. To be ready to repel such invasion requires a great revenue, and many officers become necessary to collect it. Such an invasion, however, may or may not take place. If I judge from certain documents laid before us, those who administer our affairs have but little apprehension of that event. If, then, there be little or no such danger, or if the people be sufficiently secured against it, what else have they a right to ask for in return for their money expended in the support of Government? They have a right to ask for the protection of the law in proper courts of justice, to secure the weak against the strong, the poor against the rich, the oppressed against the oppressor. And is this little which they ask to be denied? Are the means by which the injured can obtain redress to be curtailed and diminished? Much may be feared from armies. They may turn their swords against our bosoms; they may elevate a Chief to despotic power. But what danger is to be apprehended from an army of judges?

Gentlemen say, recur to the ancient system. What is the ancient system? Six judges of the Supreme Court to ride the circuit of America twice a year, and sit twice a year at the seat of Government. Without inquiring into the accuracy of a statement made by the gentleman respecting the courts of England, in which, I apprehend, he will find himself deceived, let me ask what would be the effects of the old system here? Cast an eye over the extent of our country, and a moment's consideration will show that the First Magistrate, in selecting a character for the bench, must seek less the learning of a judge than the agility of a post-boy. Can it be possible that men advanced in years, (for such alone can have the maturity of judgment fitting for the office;) that men educated in the closet—men who, from their habits of life, must have more strength of mind than of body; is it, I say, possible that such men can be running from one end of the continent to the other? Or, if they could, can they find time to hear and decide causes? I have been told by men of eminence on the bench, that they could not hold their offices under the old arrangement.

What is the present system? You have added to the old judges seven district and sixteen circuit judges. What will be the effect of the desired repeal? Will it not be a declaration to the remaining judges that they hold their offices subject to your will and pleasure? And what will be the result of this? It will be, that the check established by the Constitution, wished for by the people, and necessary in every contemplation of common sense, is destroyed. It had been said, and truly, too, that Governments are made to provide against the follies and vices of men. For to suppose that Governments rest upon reason is a pitiful solecism. If mankind were reasonable, they would want no Government. Hence, checks are required in the distribution of power among those who are to exercise it for the benefit of the people. Did the people of America vest all powers in the Legislature? No; they had vested in the judges a check intended to be efficient—a check of the first necessity, to prevent an invasion of the Constitution by unconstitutional laws—a check which might prevent any faction from intimidating or annihilating the tribunals themselves.

On this ground, said Mr. MORRIS, I stand to arrest the victory meditated over the Constitution of my country; a victory meditated by those who wish to prostrate that Constitution for the furtherance of their own ambitious views. Not of him who had recommended this measure, nor of those who now urge it; for, on his uprightness and their uprightness, I have the fullest reliance; but of those in the back-ground who have further and higher objects. These troops that protect the out-works are to be first dismissed. Those posts which present the strongest barriers are first to be taken, and then the Constitution becomes an easy prey.

Let us then, secondly, consider whether we have constitutionally a power to repeal this law. [Here Mr. MORRIS quoted the third article and first section of the Constitution.] I have heard a verbal criticism about the words shall and may, which appeared the more unnecessary to me, as the same word, shall, is applied to both members of the section. For it says "the judicial power, &c. shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish." The Legislature, therefore, had, without doubt, the right of determining, in the first instance, what inferior courts should be established; but when established, the words are imperative, a part of the judicial power shall vest in them. And "the judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour." They shall receive a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. Therefore, whether the remarks be applied to the tenure of office, or the quantum of compensation, the Constitution is equally imperative. After this exposition, gentlemen are welcome to any advantage to be derived from the criticism on shall and may.

But another criticism, which, but for its serious effects, I would call pleasant, has been made: the amount of which is, you shall not take the man from the office, but you may take the office from the man; you shall not drown him, but you may sink his boat under him; you shall not put him to death, but you may take away his life. The Constitution secures to a judge his office, says he shall hold it, that is, it shall not be taken from him during good behaviour; the Legislature shall not diminish, though their bounty may increase, his salary; the Constitution provides perfectly for the inviolability of his tenure; but yet we may destroy the office which we cannot take away, as if the destruction of the office would not as effectually deprive him of it as the grant to another person. It is admitted that no power derived from the Constitution can deprive him of the office, and yet it is contended that by repeal of the law that office may be destroyed. Is not this absurd? It had been said, that whatever one Legislature can do another can undo; because no Legislature can bind its successor, and therefore that whatever we make we can destroy. This I deny, on the ground of reason, and on that of the Constitution. What! can a man destroy his own children? Can you annul your own compacts? Can you annihilate the national debt? When you have by law created a political existence, can you, by repealing the law, dissolve the corporation you had made? When, by your laws, you give to an individual any right whatever, can you, by a subsequent law, rightfully take it away? No. When you make a compact you are bound by it. When you make a promise you must perform it. Establish the contrary doctrine, and what follows? The whim of the moment becomes the law of the land; your country will be looked upon as a den of robbers; every honest man will fly your shores. Who will trust you, when you are the first to violate your own contracts? The position, therefore, that the Legislature may rightfully repeal every law made by a preceding Legislature, when tested by reason, is untrue; and it is equally untrue when compared with the precepts of the Constitution; for, what does the Constitution say?

"You shall make no ex post facto law." Is not this an ex post facto law?

Gentlemen say the system of the last session is mere theory. For argument sake, it shall be granted; and what then is the language of reason? Try it; put it to the test of experience. What respect can the people have for a Legislature that, without reflection, meets but to undo the acts of its predecessors? Is it prudent, is it decent, even if the law were unwise, thus to commit our reputation and theirs? Is it not highly dangerous to call upon the people to decide which of us are fools, for one of us must be?

And what would be the effect on the injured man who seeks redress in a court of justice, and whom, by this repeal, you shall have deprived of his right? You have saved him a miserable cent, and you have perhaps utterly ruined him.

But the honorable mover of the resolution has told us not only what is, but what is to be. He has told us not only that suits have decreased, but that they will decrease, and, relying on this preconception, informs us that the internal taxes will be repealed; and grounds the expediency of repealing the judiciary law, on the annihilation of these taxes. Thus, taking for granted the non-existence of a law that yet exists, he infers from its destruction, and the consequent cessation of suits under it, the inutility of the judicial establishment. And when he has carried his present point, and broken down the judiciary system, he will tell us, perhaps, that we may as well repeal the internal taxes, because we have no judges to enforce the collection of them.

But what will be the effect of these repeals, and of all these dismissions from office? I impeach not the motives of gentlemen who advocate this measure. In my heart I believe them to be upright. But they see not the consequences. We are told the States want, and ought to have, more power. We are told that they are the legitimate sources from which the citizen is to derive protection. Their judges are, I suppose, to enforce our laws. Judges appointed by State authority, supported by State salary, and looking for promotion to State influence, or dependent upon State party. There are some honorable gentlemen now present, who sat in the Convention which formed this Constitution. I appeal to their recollection, if they have not seen the time when the fate of America was suspended by a hair? my life for it, if another convention be assembled, they will part without doing anything. Never, in the flow of time, was there a moment so propitious, as that in which the Convention assembled. The States had been convinced, by melancholy experience, how inadequate they were to the management of our national concerns. The passions of the people were lulled to sleep; State pride slumbered; the Constitution was promulgated; and then it awoke, and opposition was formed; but it was in vain. The people of America bound the States down by this compact.

is gone! Another great bulwark is now to be removed. You are told you must look to the States for protection; your internal revenues are to be swept away; your sole reliance must rest upon commercial duties. In this reliance you will be deceived. But what is to be the effect of all these changes? I am afraid to say; I will leave it to the feelings and consciences of gentlemen. But remember, the moment this Union is dissolved, we shall no longer be governed by votes.

Examine the annals of history. Look into the records of time, see what has been the ruin of every Republic. The vile love of popularity. Why are we here? To save the people from their most dangerous enemy; to save them from themselves. What caused the ruin of the Republics of Greece and Rome? Demagogues, who, by flattery, gained the aid of the populace to establish despotism. But if you will shut your eyes to the light of history, and your ears to the voice of experience, see at least what has happened in your own times. In 1789, it was no longer a doubt with enlightened statesmen, what would be the event of the French Revolution; before the first of January, 1790, the only question was, who would become the despot. The word liberty, indeed, from that day to this, had been sounded in our ears, but never had any real existence; there is nothing left but the word.

We are now about to violate the Constitution. Once touch it with unhallowed hands; sacrifice but one of its provisions, and we are gone. We commit the fate of America to the mercy of time and chance.

I hope the honorable gentleman from Maryland will pardon me, if, from the section of the law which he has cited, I deduce an inference diametrically opposite to that for which he has contended. He has told us that "the last Congress, in reducing the judges of the Supreme Court from six to five, have exercised the right which is now to be used, and made a legislative construction of this clause in the Constitution." But look at the law; it declares that this reduction shall not be made until, by death or resignation, only five judges shall remain. Thus, in the very moment when they express the opinion, that five judges are sufficient, they acknowledge their incompetency to remove the sixth judge, and thereby make the Legislative declaration, that they had not the right now contended for.

Mr. M. here noticed some other remarks which had fallen from the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. WRIGHT,) on the construction of the Constitution; and concluded by recapitulating his arguments. A contract, said he, is made between the Government and the Judiciary; the President appoints; the Legislature fixes his salary; he accepts the office; the contract is complete. He is then under the protection of the Constitution, which neither the President nor Congress can infringe. The contract is a solemn one. Can you violate it? If you can you may throw the Constitution into the flames—it is gone—it is dead.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

I now communicate to you a memorial of the Commissioners of the City of Washington, together with a letter of later date, which, with the memorial of January 28, 1801, will possess the Legislature fully of the state of the public interests and of those of the City of Washington confided to them. The moneys now due, and soon to become due, to the State of Maryland, on the loan guarantied by the United States, call for an early attention. The lots in the city which are chargeable with the payment of these moneys are deemed not only equal to the indemnification of the public, but to insure a considerable surplus to the city, to be employed for its improvement; provided they are offered for sale only in sufficient numbers to meet the existing demand. But the act of 1796 requires that they shall be positively sold in such numbers as shall be necessary for the punctual payment of the loans. Nine thousand dollars of interest are lately become due; three thousand dollars quarter-yearly will continue to become due; and fifty thousand dollars, an additional loan, are reimbursable on the first day of November next. These sums would require sales so far beyond the actual demand of the market, that it is apprehended that the whole property may be thereby sacrificed, the public security destroyed, and the residuary interest of the city entirely lost. Under these circumstances I have thought it my duty, before I proceed to direct a rigorous execution of the law, to submit the subject to the consideration of the Legislature. Whether the public interest will be better secured in the end, and that of the city saved, by offering sales commensurate only to the demand at market, and advancing from the Treasury, in the first instance, what these may prove deficient, to be replaced by subsequent sales, rests for the determination of the Legislature. If indulgence for the funds can be admitted, they will probably form a resource of great and permanent value; and their embarrassments have been produced only by overstrained exertions to provide accommodations for the Government of the Union.

TH: JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 11, 1802.

The Message and papers therein referred to were read, and referred to Messrs. TRACY, WRIGHT, and HOWARD, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments reported by the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act concerning the library for the use of both Houses of Congress," and the amendments, with further amendments, were adopted.

The bill was then read the third time and passed, as amended.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

The Apportionment bill, as received from the House of Representatives, was taken up. This bill fixes the ratio of representation at one member for every 33,000 persons in each State.

Mr. WELLS moved to strike out 33,000, his object being to introduce 30,000, for which he assigned his reasons at some length.

On this motion a debate of some length ensued, in which the provisions of the bill as they stood were supported by Messrs. JACKSON, MASON, WRIGHT, and COCKE; and opposed by Messrs. WELLS and HILLHOUSE.

Mr. WHITE, of Delaware.—Believing as I do, sir, that the minds of gentlemen on this floor are thoroughly made up as to the present subject, and that any observations now to be offered will not influence a single vote, but merely occupy the time of the Senate to no useful purpose, I shall ask your indulgence but a few moments. I cannot, sir, sit quietly and see this bill reported by your committee, meditating as it certainly does a manifest injury to the State I have the honor in part to represent, pass into a law, without doing more than oppose to it a silent negative; without holding up my voice and protesting most solemnly against the extreme injustice of the measure. If, sir, this bill passes in its present shape, there will be left in the State of Delaware twenty-eight thousand eight hundred and eleven people unrepresented in the popular branch of their Legislature. Gentlemen may say, that this is only a fraction, and that in a general apportionment of representation, fractional numbers are unavoidable. Sir, I acknowledge it is only a fraction, but it is a fraction that includes one-half the population of that State, and amounts, even upon the present contemplated plan, to within four thousand of the number sufficient to gain another Representative. Sir, twenty-eight or thirty thousand would, to one of the large States, be an inconsiderable fraction. Apportion that number, for instance, among the twenty-one Representatives from Virginia, and you give to each member but a fraction of about thirteen hundred; whereas from Delaware, there will be but one representative, and over and above his legal number a fraction of near twenty-nine thousand people unrepresented. Is this fair, sir? Is this equitable? I ask, gentlemen, is it not unfriendly and wrongful? And can it be possible, sir, that the transcendent omnipotence of a majority have fated, if I may use the expression, this injustice upon a sister State? Suppose, sir, Delaware to have but one Representative and Virginia twenty, a fraction of five thousand to the former is equal to a redundant number of one hundred thousand to the latter; or take, sir, the present case, and you will find that the fraction of twenty-nine thousand in the State of Delaware, apportioned upon the representation, is at least equal to a redundant number in the State of Virginia of three hundred thousand. If, sir, the divisor is fixed at thirty thousand, Delaware will have two Representatives; her weight, then, in the other House, will, in relation to Virginia, be as one to twelve, but if she is compelled to submit to the divisor of thirty-three thousand, you allow her but one Representative; you deny her nearly one-half her rightful influence, and place her on the floor of the House of Representatives in a relative situation toward Virginia, as one to twenty-one. Sir, an additional Representative to any of the larger States is not of the same consequence as another would be to Delaware. To Virginia, for instance, one is but the twentieth part of her force, to Delaware it would be one-half her force. Gentlemen may say that Delaware is the smallest State; but let it be remembered, sir, that her rights are equally sacred with those of the largest States; and although her citizens are not so numerous, yet, sir, their State sovereignty and other Constitutional rights are quite as dear and valuable to them, as the blessing can be to any other people; and, let me add, sir, she is among the oldest States; her history travels back through the bloody scenes of your Revolution; she dates her era at your Declaration of Independence, and I am proud to say, and can do so without detracting from her neighbors, in proportion to her population, her resources, and extent, during the severe contest for American liberty, she contributed, in blood and treasure, as freely to its support and permanent establishment, as any State in the Union.

But, Mr. President, there is another point of light in which I must be permitted to present the glaring injustice of this measure. By the Constitution of the United States, taxation is not apportioned among the respective States according to representation, but according to population. Delaware, then, although in the House of Representatives, where the money affairs of our country are principally managed, she has but one member, and Virginia twenty-one, is not taxed to the amount only of the twentieth part of the taxes of Virginia, according to representation, but to the amount of the twelfth part of the taxes of that State, according to population. Thus, sir, nearly one-half the citizens of Delaware are obliged to pay their proportion of taxes to the support of your Government, when you allow them no voice in either laying and disposing of those taxes, or, what is perhaps even more material, in pointing out the objects of taxation. Their situation may, in some respects, be likened to a very memorable grievance once heavily complained of in this country, when the Parliament of Great Britain arrogated to themselves the right of taxing our fathers without their consent.

Sir, the doctrine urged by some gentlemen that the divisor of thirty thousand will increase the House of Representatives to a body too large and unwieldy for the convenient and ordinary purposes of business, seems to me totally without foundation. The observation and experience of every man must be sufficient at once to satisfy him that this cannot be the consequence; we have before our eyes, sir, examples that prove directly the reverse. This divisor will give to your House of Representatives but one hundred and fifty-seven members; the State of Virginia has in the popular branch of her Legislature one hundred and eighty members, and we have not been told that it is too numerous. The British House of Commons, before the union with Ireland, consisted of about five hundred and fifty members, and we heard no complaint of the numbers; on the contrary, sir, the nation wished a fuller representation; and it is from that House, too, sir, that, according to this logic, must be so extremely riotous and disorderly, we have drawn most of the rules that govern the proceedings of this honorable body.

Judiciary System.

Again, sir, the nature and spirit of your Government requires a full representation in the Legislature. It is a Government that must depend alone for its support upon the affections of the people; and the best security for their affections is to extend to them, upon as large a scale as comports with the public safety, the freedom of choice, and right of representation. In so extensive a country as this, many parts of which are thinly inhabited, and the election districts consequently including vast tracts of territory, it must often happen that the electors are entirely unacquainted with the person for whom they vote; but if you increase the representation, you reduce the size of the election districts; you bring the candidate within the very neighborhood of the electors; they see him, they know him; they are better enabled to estimate truly his character, and judge of his capacity and disposition to serve them. This, sir, will secure, in a great degree, the constituent from imposition, and attach to the Representative a higher and more immediate responsibility; it will inspire the people with confidence in your Government, and induce them more cheerfully to acquiesce in your laws. But, above all, sir, the divisor of thirty thousand leaves throughout the United States a less aggregate of unrepresented fractions than any divisor you can take; less, permit me to say, sir, by one hundred and sixteen thousand, than the one contemplated in the bill; and I am sure gentlemen on all sides of the House wish the country as fairly represented as possible. To my mind this is a most conclusive argument in favor of the divisor of thirty thousand.

I am told, sir, that this has been made a party question; that party considerations influence it. What could have induced to this, is not for me to say; I will attribute no improper motives to any honorable gentleman, but it has not pleased God to bless me with sagacity enough to discover anything in it that even savored of party. Sir, parties have already attained in this country a sufficient height, not only for our happiness but for our safety; and it argues but a small regard for the public good, to stamp every subject with that complexion. If this question involves any separate interests, they are those, sir, of the smaller and larger States. With the former, then, the cause I advocate is a common cause, and I am sure gentlemen will give it due consideration, and not suffer any party feelings, however disguised, to influence them. Sir, a doctrine has of late been publicly avowed, which I must be permitted to notice, as, in my estimation, extremely hostile to the rights of the smaller States; it is said that the House of Representatives is not their ground, that they must look to themselves in the Senate, and take care on this floor that sovereignties are not destroyed. I hope gentlemen representing the smaller States will profit by this warning; it is well worth their attention; it comes, sir, from the largest and most influential State in the Union. The point it leads to, I presume not to say, and fear, sir, even to conjecture.

The question was now taken on the motion to strike out 33,000, and lost—ayes 11. noes 15.

Mr. MORRIS then moved, and Mr. TRACY seconded the motion to add, after "one representative for every 33,000," the words "and one representative for every fractional number of 27,000 persons;" The number 27,000 was used to avoid a violation of the Constitution, which prohibits the allotting to each State more representatives than one for every 30,000. Thus, in the case of Delaware, the ratio being 33,000, Delaware would be entitled to one member for 33,000, and one for the fraction of 27,000: both which numbers would amount to 60,000; which last number entitled a State to two members without violating the Constitution. This motion was opposed by Messrs. WRIGHT and ANDERSON, and was lost—ayes 10, noes 15.

On the question to agree to the final passage of this bill, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 5, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Chipman, Cocke, Colhoun, Dayton, Ellery, T. Foster, Dwight Foster, Franklin, Howard, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, J. Mason, Morris, Nicholas, Sheafe, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Hillhouse, Olcott, Tracy, Wells, and White.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

TUESDAY, January 12.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I now communicate to you a letter from the Secretary of State, enclosing an estimate of the expenses which appear at present necessary for carrying into effect the Convention between the United States of America, and the French Republic, which has been prepared at the request of the House of Representatives.

TH: JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 12, 1802.

The Message and papers accompanying it were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 6th instant, "That the act of Congress passed on the 13th day of February, 1801, entitled 'An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the Courts of the United States,' ought to be repealed."

Mr. JACKSON, of Georgia.—I rise with an impression of awe on the present question; for we must tread on Constitutional ground, which should not be lightly touched on, nor too hastily decided. Every step we take ought to be well examined, and our minds convinced before we give that vote which cannot be recalled, and which will fix a principle on Legislative construction, which, perhaps, will prevail as long as we remain a nation.

In the early stage of this discussion, I had almost determined to say nothing, and am at present determined not to say much; but a justification of the vote I shall give, has impelled me to offer my reasons for it to the State I represent; and I have made up my mind, decidedly, to vote for the resolution before you, if I cannot be otherwise convinced.

I conceive, that as this subject requires from us a legislative construction, that construction may as well, and indeed better, be now made; there will undoubtedly hereafter be a clashing of powers. I therefore think it is much better to decide it now, when the injury is felt, than to suffer it to take root until it shall extort a different and more violent decision than that of a deliberative body.

The reasons for the resolution have been so ably stated, and strongly enforced, by the gentleman from Kentucky who moved it, as to expediency, and the burden of the expenses on the present system, that I shall therefore say little about them.

The expenses, however, of the Judiciary establishment, I deem the least important consideration attached to the subject. Yet, I do not agree with the gentleman who has spoken, that the expense is trifling. The gentleman from New-York had held up the insignificance of a cent a person, and had told us of Alfred's purse, which no one dared to take away. Let that gentleman calculate twelve souls to a family, and he will see that each family would pay twelve cents; a sum, however insignificant to the pocket of that gentleman, that might furnish a comfortable meal to a poor family. With the gentleman from Kentucky, however, I contend that the principle is as much settled by one cent as by a million. And this observation becomes incalculably dangerous, if it is to be drawn into precedent on every new project or improper measure, that it costs but a cent a person. And as to the remarks about Alfred, I might retaliate upon the gentleman, and say, that at that day twelve cents might have been a year's salary for a judge.

We have been asked, if we are afraid of having an army of judges? For myself, I am more afraid of an army of judges, under the patronage of the President, than of an army of soldiers. The former can do us more harm. They may deprive us of our liberties, if attached to the Executive, from their decisions; and from the tenure of office contended for, we cannot remove them; while the soldier, however he may act, is enlisted, or if not enlisted, only subsisted for two years; whilst the judge is enlisted for life, for his salary cannot be taken from him. [See 12th division, 8th Sect. 1st Art. Constitution.] Sir, it is said these evils will not happen. But what security have we for the truth of the declaration? Have we not seen sedition laws? Have we not heard judges crying out through the land, sedition! and asking those whose duties it was to inquire, is there no sedition here? It is true, the sedition law had expired with the last Administration, and he trusted it would not exist, or at least be acted on, under the virtuous Jefferson. But hereafter if it should exist, your judges, under the cry of sedition and political heresy, may place half your citizens in irons. I thank God, that no such law now exists, or is likely to exist. I thank God, that we are not now under the influence of an intolerant clergy, as is evident from their abuse of the President; and that we are not under dread of the patronage of judges, is manifest, from their attack on the Secretary of State. And I trust, that we shall long keep this patronage off, by not sanctioning the religious persecution of the clergy on the one hand, nor the political violence of the judges on the other.

But I will forbear making any further remarks of this kind, and go into an examination of the Constitutional grounds.

Here then, said he, are two tribunals. First, the Supreme Court, the creature of the Constitution, the creature of the people; the other, the inferior jurisdictions, the creature of the Legislature. And notwithstanding the play of gentlemen upon the words shall and may, they are in meaning essentially different. The word shall, applied to the Supreme Court, is imperative and commanding, while the word may, applied to the inferior courts, is discretionary, and leaves to the Legislature a volition to act, or not to act, as it sees fit.

Again, why are the peculiar and exclusive powers of the Supreme Court designated in the following section of the Constitution, but because the Constitution considered that tribunal as absolutely established; while it viewed the inferior tribunals as dependent upon the will of the Legislature? And that this was the case was evident from the conduct of the Supreme Court on the pension act, which that court had some time since declared unconstitutional; and which declaration, he was convinced, would not have been hazarded by an inferior tribunal.

But does this conclusion rest on judicial power alone? Is it no where else found under other heads of Constitutional power? Yes, sir, under the Legislative head of power, which is the first grant of power made by the Constitution. For by the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, after enumerating the power of laying taxes, &c., it is declared in the ninth division thereof, "to extend to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court." Here, then, is a Legislative power given expressly to that body, without restriction or application to any other branch of the National Government. Let those lawyers who hear me decide on the construction of all grants or deeds, if two grants be made in the same deed to two different powers or persons, if the first does not exclusively vest?

Is there a single argument that can be assigned to oppose this construction of the Constitution? Do not the observations of gentlemen, who insist upon the permanent tenure of the Judicial office, place the creature above its creator, man above his God, the model above its mechanic? A good mechanic, when he constructs a machine, tries it; and if it does not succeed, he either mends it or throws it away. Is there not the same necessity for acting in the same way with the inferior tribunals of the Judiciary, which is no other than the machine of the Legislature?

But, upon the principles of gentlemen, the law which creates a judge cannot be touched. The moment it is passed, it exists to the end of time. What is the implication of this doctrine? To alter or amend what may greatly require alteration or amendment, it is necessary to return to the creator, and to inquire what this creator is. My principle is, that the creator is the people themselves; that very people of the United States whom the gentleman from New York had declared ourselves to be the guardians of, to save the people themselves from their greatest enemies; and to save whom from destroying themselves he had invoked this House. Good God! is it possible that I have heard such a sentiment in this body? Rather should I have expected to have heard it sounded from the despots of Turkey, or the deserts of Siberia, than to have heard it uttered by an enlightened legislator of a free country, and on this floor.

But, said Mr. J., let us examine how we are to get at the creator. If the honorable gentleman will put us into the way of doing this with effect, I will abandon all my arguments for this motion. Look to the Constitution, and see how it is to be amended. It can only be amended on the recommendation of two-thirds of both Houses, or, on the application of two-thirds of the States, a convention shall be called, who are to propose amendments, afterwards to be ratified by three-fourths of the States.

There is required first, then, two-thirds of both Houses of Congress. Can this two-thirds be found now, or is there any probability of its being found for twenty years to come, who will concur in making the necessary alterations in the Judiciary system that are now, or may hereafter, be required? On this subject there are as many opinions as there are persons on this floor. I have indeed never found two persons precisely agree. How, then, can we expect three-fourths of the Legislatures of the several States to agree when we cannot agree among ourselves. There is, in fact, no amendment which could reach the case, and exhibit to view all the requisite and necessary regulations for such an extent of country. Such an attempt must form a volume, a Constitution by itself, and after all fall short of the object.

I am clearly, therefore, of opinion, that if the power to alter the Judiciary system vests not here, it vests nowhere. It follows, from the ideas of gentlemen, that we must submit to all the evils of the present system, though it should exhibit all the horrors of the Inquisition.

But, said Mr. J., gentlemen say the United States embrace a vast extent of territory, from fifteen to seventeen thousand miles in length. What is the inevitable deduction to be drawn from this fact? Why, that a system which is to apply to this extent of country, embracing different laws and different habits, will require frequent alterations: whereas, if we are tied down to a system of inferior tribunals once formed, we cannot even touch the plan of the Judicial system of the little District of Columbia. Nor can we touch the inferior jurisdictions in the Northwestern Territory, or in the Mississippi Territory, in both of which the systems were acknowledged to be adapted only to present circumstances, and in the last of which the rights of Georgia were implicated. It follows, that whatever these rights may be, the system is sacred; and, as to the Mississippi Territory, if grounded on this doctrine, notwithstanding the claim of Georgia, her jurisdiction is totally lost. To revert to the sedition law. If the doctrine supported now were true, then, had the sedition law been incorporated as a system by itself, an inferior tribunal, and officers been attached to it, would it have been perpetually tacked to the Constitution? That law under which so many of our citizens have been imprisoned for writings and speakings; and one, among others, for wishing that the wadding of a gun had been lodged in a certain Presidential part.

The gentleman had dwelt on the inconveniences and evils of the old system, and had particularly condemned that part of it, which, as he termed it, had converted the judges into post-boys. But I will appeal to the gentleman, if in England, where so much more business is done, there are more than twelve judges, and whether those judges do not ride the circuit? And why shall our judges not ride the circuits? Shall we have six judges sitting here to decide cases which require a knowledge of the laws, the morals, the habits, the state of the property of the several States? Would not this knowledge be much better obtained by their riding the circuits, and in the States themselves, making themselves acquainted with whatever relates to them, and the cases of appeals to come before them? It has been remarked by a celebrated writer on the English Constitution, that one of the greatest political evils that could befall a people was the existence of large judiciary bodies. To illustrate his ideas, he had instanced the Parliaments of France. If the spirit which last session gave existence to sixteen new judges continued, who could say by what number they would be limited? They might indeed soon become, what they had been likened to, an army of judges.

I do not wish to be severe in my remarks on the conduct of the late Administration. I admire the private character of Mr. Adams. But I do believe the succession of his political acts tended ultimately to accumulate in, and attach all powers to, a particular person or favorite family.

If I wished to bestow on Mr. Jefferson this mass of patronage, which I contend this horde of officers bestows, I should be in favor of the bill that it is now moved to repeal; but, as a political person, I am no more for Thomas Jefferson than for John Adams. When he acts, according to my opinion, right, I will support him; when wrong, oppose him; and I trust a majority on this floor will act in the same way.

A gentleman from Massachusetts has asked if suits will go on diminishing, and if the millenium is so near at hand? Sir, different opinions are held on this subject; for some suppose the millenium to have arrived long since, and others that it may arrive, and others again that it never would arrive; but there is one thing certain, that the more courts you have, the greater temptation there is for litigation, and more suits, or rather evils, will flow from them. Law itself is but a necessary evil; for if mankind were perfect—were it not for their frailties and passions—there would be no occasion for it; and lawyers are a still greater evil, although, he acknowledged, a necessary one. They seldom discourage litigious suitors, and swarm in our courts; and there are here, as well as in every other country, persons so fond of law, and of persecution, that rather than not be in courts at all, they would direct their lawyers, as I have been formerly told of a man who applied for advice, and was informed he had no ground of action, to bring, then, a spite action. The State courts are open and competent to most of the inferior court business, and it ought to be thrown into that channel as much as possible.

With respect to the usefulness of the additional judges, created by the act of last session, it was, perhaps, unnecessary to add anything to what had been so ably observed by the gentleman from Kentucky. But I will state, for the information of the Senate, that in the Southern States of Georgia, South and North Carolina, a ground of great litigation is removed, one which had originated at least two hundred and fifty suits. Miller & Co. had obtained a patent for a ginning machine (God knew where it came from, but I believe that neither of them invented it) so as to make those States tributary to them, and embroil them in disputes. South Carolina had purchased that patent for $50,000, and had therefore dried up this source of litigation in that State.

The recovery of British debts, too, was nearly over. This had been a fruitful source of litigation. Our citizens had been sued, and their late hard earnings of property had been seized to satisfy British demands, whilst their former property had been taken from them by British arms during the war.

I am surprised to hear the cry, that our liberties and the Constitution are endangered, from the quarter from whence it is now urged. When such remarks had been made by those gentlemen with whom I generally acted on former occasions, the instantaneous cry was against demagogues, who, by artfully inflaming the passions of the people against the Government, wished to break down the Constitution.

A gentleman had talked about a victory meditated over the Constitution. Not by the President; not by us. By whom then was it meditated? Was it by the House of Representatives? Or was it by the people themselves—that same people whom we were to save from their greatest enemy, themselves? For my part, I believe in the meditation of no such victory. Sooner, for my part, than participate in it, by voting for this resolution, if I thought it would have such a tendency, I would cut off my hand, or cut out my tongue. I respect and love the Constitution, and my great wish is, with father Paul, to cry out, as respects it, esto perpetua.

Mr. TRACY, of Connecticut.—Feeble as I am, I have thought it my duty to offer my sentiments on this subject. Owing to severity of indisposition I have not been in my place, nor have I heard any of the discussion. This circumstance will be my apology, if, in the remarks I shall make, repetitions shall occur on the one hand, and apparent inattention to arguments on the other.

Having been a member of this Government during several years, and being impressed with the difficulties attending the formation of a judiciary system, I have thought proper to give a concise history of Legislative proceedings on this important subject. Permit me to say, sir, that the first institution of such a system must be an experiment. It is impossible to ascertain until tried the effects of a system co-extensive with the vast territory of the United States, and which ought to be adapted to the different laws and habits of the different States.

Soon after the first law was enacted, as early as the year 1793, and I believe sooner, complaints were made of the system of circuit courts. The Union then being divided into three circuits, and two of the six judges were obliged to attend each court, if one judge failed, all the business of course was continued to the next term. Judges complained of the distance they had to travel, and suitors and lawyers complained of delays. In 1793, if my memory is correct, the law passed allowing one judge to attend with the district judge in each district, with some other modifications not important in the present view of the subject. If, by reason of distance, badness of roads, sickness, or any other accident, this one judge failed of attendance, or if he and the district judge differed on any point, a delay was occasioned. If the same judge attended the same circuit at the next term, another delay, and so on, till experience taught us, that some alteration in the system was requisite. It will be recollected, that the judges had to travel over this extensive country twice in each year, and to encounter the extremes of both heat and cold. Of this they complained; but this was not all; the business was not done.

At several sessions of Congress, the subject of the circuit courts was before them; committees were appointed in both Houses, and in more than one communication of the Executive at the commencement of sessions, a revision of the system was recommended. I cannot, on memory, detail the exact particulars, or order of time; but in the Speech made by the President at the opening of the session of 1799, the subject is stated as follows:

“To give due effect to the civil administration of Government, and to insure a just execution of the laws, a revision and amendment of the judiciary system is indispensably necessary. In this extensive country, it cannot but happen, that numerous questions respecting the interpretation of the laws, and the rights and duties of officers and citizens, must arise. On the one hand, the laws should be executed—on the other, individuals should be guarded from oppression; neither of these objects is sufficiently assured, under the present organization of the judicial department; I therefore earnestly recommend the subject to your serious consideration.”

Judiciary System.

SENATE.

Although this subject had been recommended before, and committees had contemplated a revision and alteration of the system, I do not remember that a bill had ever been presented to either House of Congress until 1799. In that session, a bill was reported similar in its features to the act which passed last session. It might have been acted upon in the House of Representatives; of this however I am not confident; but I recollect it was printed, and the members of both Houses had it before them; and at the last session, with some alterations and amendments, it was enacted into a law. I believe all parties wished for a revision and amendment of the system, in respect to circuit courts; the difference of opinion was principally this: some supposed an increase of the judges of the Supreme Court to such a number as would render the duties of the circuit practicable for them, and provide for the completion of business, would be the best amendment; the others thought the law, as it passed, was preferable.

I acknowledge, that in deliberating upon this subject, we always assumed the principle, that the establishment of courts was important to protect the rights of the people; we did not fear an army of judges, as has been hinted by the gentleman last up, (Mr. JACKSON.) In this opinion we might be mistaken, but we were honest in our professions. Although some believed, that more of the business of the United States might be confided to the State courts; yet it is not within my recollection, that the question was considered in any measure a party question. I am confident, that at the session of 1799, and for a long time before that, the friends of this law, which eventually passed last Winter, could not, nor did not, contemplate any change of administration. A revision of the system was long a subject of deliberation; we believed an increase of circuit judges, to the number requisite to perform the duties, would be an inconvenient increase of the Supreme Court; and though it was desirable for the judges of the Supreme Court to see the people and be seen of them, yet the preference was given to the system now proposed to be repealed. We supposed it would be an evil to increase the number of judges of the Supreme Court to thirteen, fifteen, or seventeen. A court which is to act together, should not be numerous; on this subject all men have agreed; here may be danger of an "army of judges," as the gentleman says; for although in Great Britain the twelve judges are sometimes called to give an opinion, yet no man will feel equal confidence in a tribunal of judges for the business of a court, consisting of many as of few; from three to five, the good sense and experience of all nations has declared to be about the proper number; and we thought it conducive to the general good, to establish tribunals in such manner as to carry justice to the door of every man.

In this modification of the system, the jurisdiction of the circuit court has been extended, as it respects the sum in demand, of which they are to take cognizance, and as it respects the disputes which arise concerning the title of lands; and exclusive jurisdiction is given of all crimes committed within fifty miles of their place of session. The intention was, to insure a prompt execution of justice, and experiment alone can test the wisdom of the plan.

I take it to be a sound rule, adopted by all wise and deliberate bodies, not to repeal an existing law, until experiment shall have discovered errors, or unless there is a vice so apparent on the face of the law, as that justice shall require an immediate destruction of it. Has there been time to gain information by experiment? No man will pretend this as a justification of the repeal; for the little time the law has been in force, so far as I have obtained any knowledge upon the subject, it has gained credit.

Another maxim in legislation, I think, is correct, not to give up a law in existence, which is conversant about extensive and important concerns of the community, and about which there is a necessity of enacting some law, without seeing clearly what can be substituted for it, and that the substitute has manifest advantages. This resolution leads to no result, but a repeal. I have stated the errors of the former system of circuit courts, and if expense is an objection to the present system, as I have heard urged out of doors, the same, or nearly as much, must be incurred, if we increase the number of judges of the Supreme Court, as to effect a reform in the Circuit Court. Why repeal this law then, and leave us without any, or without any adequate to its purpose?

Is this system so very vicious, that it deserves nothing but abhorrence and destruction? It costs us a little more than thirty thousand dollars, and by it the number of circuit judges is increased to sixteen; and by it likewise is contemplated reducing the number of supreme judges to five, when it can constitutionally be done. Is the expense an object, when by that expense we extend the jurisdiction of a court over this vastly extensive, growing country, and carry law and protection to every man? This country is in a singular condition; a great tract of unsettled lands is peopling with rapidity, and numerous emigrations increase our population far beyond its natural increase; is it not of importance that courts should be located among them, early, to correct the restless spirit which is frequent in new and scattered settlements? And are not the emigrations composed of such as require the prompt assistance of the law, to preserve among them regularity? Punishment, to us, and to all good men, should be a strange work; but to prevent crimes, is the work of a God. I speak to gentlemen, who have many of them graced the judge's bench, and adorned the professional robe they have worn, and am therefore not obliged to be particular that I may be understood; a word to the wise will be sufficient. A judiciary, in a national point of view, is absolutely necessary, and an extension of it to every national purpose is equally necessary. To depend upon State courts, not under obligations nor amenable to you, besides having as much business allotted to them by the respective States as they can accomplish, and depending upon them, and not on us, for existence—will require only to be mentioned, to be exploded. Locating your judges in various parts of the country, by them promulgating the national laws, which it is well known has been a subject of great difficulty, and giving them daily opportunity of mixing with people, not well disposed to order and law; may prevent disorders and insurrections, and save millions of expense, which pecuniary saving will be the least of the important events arising from such a system.

But it will probably be said, the courts have not business to employ them; and the documents received from the Executive will be produced in evidence. And it may further be said, the President has in his Message recommended a repeal of this law. The words of the Message are: "The Judiciary system of the United States, and especially that portion of it lately erected, will of course present itself to the contemplation of Congress; and that they may be able to judge of the proportion which the institution bears to the business it has to perform, I have caused to be procured from the several States, and now lay before Congress, an exact statement of all the causes decided since the first establishment of the courts, and of those that were depending when additional courts and judges were brought in to their aid."

Is this a recommendation to repeal? Suppose for argument's sake it is. Let us look at this "exact" statement. In the recapitulation, 19th page of document 8, there appears to have been instituted 8,276 suits, and pending, when this court went into operation, 1,539. But on further inspection it will be found, that Maryland is entirely omitted; this omission is unaccountable, since the means of knowledge were so near at hand.—119 causes undecided in Tennessee; 134 in North Carolina, and 331 in Virginia, are omitted; making in the whole an error of five or six hundred causes. In addition to this, the number of suits in New York are not stated correctly by the statement of the attorney when he made the return, and not one is carried out as pending in the recapitulation; and the return of Massachusetts is incorrect on its face; so that nothing more than conjecture can be derived from this "exact" statement. The President is usually more correct, and how this peremptory language in the Message comports with the document, every man can see for himself. I am not disposed to attribute intentional error to any man, much less to the Executive; but in point of use the statement amounts to nothing; we may just as well imagine without it as with it, how many suits were pending at the institution of the new courts.

But I acknowledge that the number of suits pending is not in my mind any criterion upon which a correct judgment may be formed of the utility or necessity of courts; or, to say the most of it, it forms but one ground of judging, and that not a very conclusive one. In a country thinly settled it is frequently as important to establish courts as in a more populous country; and as this Government is situated, it may be more so; and yet the number of suits will bear no proportion. Why did we establish courts in our territorial government but on this principle?

A number of courts properly located will keep the business of any country in such condition as but few suits will be instituted; and courts badly organized will discourage suitors, and there will be but few actions returned. From the number of suits alone, there can no sound judgment be formed.

But there is another objection to the repeal of the judiciary law, which in my mind is conclusive: I mean the letter and spirit of the Constitution.

In the formation of every Government, in which the people have a share in its administration, some established and indisputable principles must be adopted. In our Government, the formation of a Legislative, Executive and Judiciary power, is one of the incontrovertible principles; and that each should be independent of the other, so far as human frailty will permit, is equally incontrovertible. Will it be expected, that I should quote Sidney, De Lolme, Montesquieu, and a host of elementary writers, to prove this assertion? There is probably no conflict of opinion upon this subject. When we look into our Constitution of Government, we shall find, in every part of it, a close and undeviating attention to this principle. Our particular form is singular in its requirements, that full force and operation be given to this all important principle. Our powers are limited, many acts of sovereignty are prohibited to the National Government, and retained by the States, and many restraints are imposed upon State sovereignty. If either, by accident or design, should exceed its powers, there is the utmost necessity that some timely checks, equal to every exigency, should be interposed. The Judiciary is established by the Constitution for that valuable purpose.

In the British Government, the legislature is omnipotent to every legislative effect, and is a perpetual convention for almost every Constitutional purpose. Hence it is easy to discern the different part which must be assigned to the judiciary in the two kinds of government. In England the Executive has the most extensive powers; the sword or the military force; the right of making war, and in effect the command of all the wealth of the nation, with an unqualified veto to every legislative act. It is, therefore, rational for that nation to preserve their judiciary completely independent of their Sovereign. In the United States, the caution must be applied to the existing danger; the Judiciary are to be a check on the Executive, but most emphatically to the Legislature of the Union, and those of the several States. What security is there to an individual, if the Legislature of the Union or any particular State, should pass a law, making any of his transactions criminal which took place anterior to the date of the law? None in the world but by an appeal to the Judiciary of the United States, where he will obtain a decision that the law itself is unconstitutional and void, or by a resort to revolutionary principles, and exciting a civil war. With a view to those principles, and knowing that the framers of our Constitution were fully possessed of them, let us examine the instrument itself. Article third, section first: "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour; and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office." Are there words in the English language more explicit? Is there any condition annexed to the judge's tenure of office, other than good behaviour? Of whom shall your judges be independent? We are led to an erroneous decision on this, as well as many other governmental subjects, by constantly recurring to Great Britain. That their courts should be independent of their Sovereign is an important object; he is the fountain of honor and power, and can do no wrong; our President, at least for several years past, has been considered as the fountain of dishonor and weakness, and if there was any maxim upon the subject, it was that he could do no right. Of course the great object of the independence of the Judiciary must here have reference not only to our Executive, but our Legislature. The Legislature with us is the fountain of power. No person will say that the judges of the Supreme Court can be removed, unless by impeachment and conviction of misbehaviour; but the judges of the inferior courts, as soon as ordained and established, are placed upon precisely the same grounds of independence with the judges of the Supreme Court. Congress may take their own time to ordain and establish, but the instant that is done, all their rights of independence attach to them.

JANUARY, 1802.

Judiciary System.

SENATE.

If this reasoning is correct, can you repeal a law establishing an inferior court, under the Constitution? Will it be said, that although you cannot remove the judge from office, yet you can remove his office from him? Is murder prohibited, and may you shut a man up, and deprive him of sustenance, till he dies, and this not be denominated murder? The danger in our Government is, and always will be, that the Legislative body will become restive, and perhaps unintentionally break down the barriers of our Constitution. It is incidental to man, and a part of our imperfections, to believe that power may be safely lodged in our hands. We have the wealth of the nation at command, and are invested with almost irresistible strength; the judiciary has neither force nor wealth to protect itself. That we can, with propriety, modify our judiciary system, so that we always leave the judges independent, is a correct and reasonable position; but if we can, by repealing a law, remove them, they are in the worst state of dependence.

I have exhausted myself, and I fear, the patience of the Senate, and regret exceedingly that my indisposition prevented me from a better preparation upon this important question. I have attempted to show, that the establishment of a judiciary system for this country is, and must be, attended with difficulties; and that the Legislature have taken such measures as to a majority of them appeared most reasonable, after much attention to the subject, to cure the evils of the old system, by the substitution of a new system.

And let it be remarked, that the law now under consideration, although it modified our courts, is strictly guarded against a violation of the principles I have here contended for. The Supreme Court is to consist of but five judges after the next vacancy shall happen; and the district judges of Tennessee and Kentucky are associated with a circuit judge, to perform the duties of circuit judges, which duties it is well known they performed ever since the district courts were established; and in the clause which increases their salaries, they are styled the district judges; and all the alteration made in their circumstances, is, an increase of duty, and of salary. I have attempted to show the primary necessity of rendering the Judiciary of this confederated Government completely independent, not only of the Executive, but especially so of the Legislature.

And by adverting to the words of the instrument itself, I have attempted to show, that the Judiciary are secured, so far as words can do it, as well from a circuitous removal, by repealing the law constituting the court of which they are judges, as by any direct removal.

I am strongly impressed with the magnitude of this subject; perhaps the whims of a sick man's fancy have too much possessed me, to view it correctly; but, sir, I apprehend the repeal of this law will involve in it the total destruction of our Constitution. It is supported by three independent pillars; the Legislative, Executive and Judiciary; and if any rude hand should pluck either of them away, the beautiful fabric must tumble into ruins. The Judiciary is the centre pillar, and a support to each by checking both; on the one side is the sword, and on the other is the wealth of the nation; and it has no inherent capacity to defend itself.

These very circumstances united, may provoke an attack, and which ever power prevails so far as to vest in itself, directly or indirectly, the power of the Judiciary, by rendering it dependent, it is the precise definition of tyranny, and must produce its effects. The Goths and Vandals destroyed not only the Government of Rome, but the city itself; they were savages, and felt the loss of neither; but if it be possible there can be an intention, like the son of Manoa, with his strength, without his godliness, to tumble this fabric to the earth, let it be remembered it will crush in one undistinguished ruin, its perpetrators, with those whom they may call their political enemies.

I most earnestly entreat gentlemen to pause and consider. I apprehend the repeal of this act will be the hand-writing on the wall, stamping Mene Tekel upon all we hold dear and valuable in our Constitution. Let not the imputation of instability, which is cast upon all popular bodies, be verified by us—in adopting laws to-day, and repealing them to-morrow, for no reason, but that we have the power, and will exercise it.

This Constitution is an invaluable inheritance; if we make inroads upon it and destroy it, no matter with what intentions, it cannot be replaced; we shall never have another.

WEDNESDAY, January 13.

THE JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 6th inst. that the act of Congress passed on the 13th day of February, 1801, entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the Courts of the United States," ought to be repealed.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia.—I feel some degree of embarrassment in offering my sentiments on a subject so fully and so ably discussed. I believe that the ground taken by my friend from Kentucky has not been shaken by any arguments urged in opposition to the resolution on the table. Yet as some observations have been made, calculated to excite sensibility, not here, but abroad; as they appear to have been made with a view to that end; and as an alarm has been attempted to be excited on Constitutional ground, I think the observations ought not to go unnoticed.

I agree with gentlemen, that it is important, in a well regulated Government, that the judicial department should be independent. But I have never been among those who have carried this idea to the extent which seems at this day to be fashionable. Though of opinion that each department ought to discharge its proper duties free from the fear of the others, yet I have never believed that they ought to be independent of the nation itself. Much less have I believed it proper, or that our Constitution authorizes our courts of justice to control the other departments of the Government.

All the departments of a popular Government must depend, in some degree, on popular opinion. None can exist without the affections of the people, and if either be placed in such a situation as to be independent of the nation, it will soon lose that affection which is essential to its durable existence.

Without, however, going into an inquiry of what kind of organization is most fit for our tribunals; without inquiring into the fitness of making the judges independent for life, I am willing to enter into a consideration, not of what ought to be, but of what is. Whatever opinion I may individually entertain of the provisions of the Constitution relative to the Judiciary, sitting here under that Constitution, I am bound to observe it as the charter under which we are assembled.

When I view the provisions of the Constitution on this subject, I observe a clear distinction between the Supreme Court and other courts. I am sensible that when we come to make verbal criticisms, any gentleman of a sportive imagination may amuse our fancies by a play upon words. But this is not the way to get rid of a genuine construction of the Constitution. With regard to the institution of the Supreme Court, the words are imperative; while, with regard to inferior tribunals, they are discretionary. The first shall, the last may be established. And surely we are to infer from the wise sages that formed that Constitution, that nothing was introduced into it in vain. Not only sentences, but words, and even points, elucidate its meaning. When, therefore, the Constitution, using this language, says a Supreme Court shall be established, are we not justified in considering it as of Constitutional creation? And on the other hand, from the language applied to inferior courts, are we not equally justified in considering their establishment as dependent upon the Legislature, who may, from time to time, ordain them, as the public good requires? Can any other meaning be applied to the words "from time to time?" And nothing can be more important on this subject than that the Legislature should have power, from time to time, to create, to annul, or to modify the courts, as the public good may require, not merely to-day, but forever; and whenever a change of circumstances may suggest the propriety of a different organization. On this point, there is great force in the remark of the gentleman from Georgia, that among the enumerated powers given to Congress, while there is no mention made of the Supreme Court, the power of establishing inferior courts is expressly given. Why this difference, but that the Supreme Court was considered by the framers of the Constitution, as established by the Constitution, while they considered the inferior courts as dependent upon the will of the Legislature.

We find the phrase, "from time to time," in another part of the Constitution. The 3d section of the 2d article says, the President shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union. That is, he shall occasionally, as he sees fit, give such information. So shall Congress occasionally, as they see fit, establish annual or regulate inferior courts, accordingly as the public welfare requires.

The arguments of gentlemen go upon a mistaken principle. They express the liveliest sympathy and commiseration for this poor, this weak department of our Government. They tell us the judges have a vested right to their offices—a right not now derived from the law, but from the Constitution; and they assimilate their case to that of a public debt; to the right of a corporation; a turnpike company, or a toll-bridge. But is not all this reasoning predicated on the principle that the courts are established, not for the public benefit, but for the emolument of the judges; not to administer justice, but for their personal aggrandizement? I believe that a Government ought to proceed upon different principles. It ought to establish only those institutions which the good of the community requires; when that good ceases to need them, they ought to be put down, and, of consequence, the judges should hold their appointments so long, and no longer, than the public welfare requires.

If the arguments now urged be correct, that a court once established cannot be vacated, we are led into the greatest absurdities. Congress might deem it expedient to establish a court for particular purposes, limited as to its objects or duration. For instance: the United States has taken possession of the Mississippi Territory, rightfully or not, I will not pretend to say. This territory has been heretofore in the hands of various masters, viz:

SENATE.

France, England, Spain, and Georgia; and it is now possessed by the United States. All these Governments, except the United States, made certain grants of lands in the territory, and certain settlers spread their conflicting patents over the country. These different titles will open a wide field for litigation, which will require able tribunals to decide upon. Suppose, then, Congress should establish special tribunals to continue for three, four, or five years, to settle these claims. Judges would be appointed. They would be the judges of an inferior court. If the construction of the Constitution now contended for be established, what would the judges say, when the period for which they were appointed expired? Would they not say, we belong to inferior courts? Would they not laugh at you when you told them their term of office was out? Would they not say, in the language of the gentleman from New York, though the law that creates us is temporary, we are in by the Constitution? Have we not heard this doctrine supported in the memorable case of the mandamus, lately before the Supreme Court? Was it not there said that, though the law had a right to establish the office of a justice of the peace, yet it had not a right to abridge its duration to five years; that it was right in making the justices, but unconstitutional in limiting their periods of office; that, being a judicial officer, he had a right to hold his office during life—or, what is the same thing—during good behaviour, in despite of the law which created him, and in the very act of creation limiting his official life to five years.

I may notice another case, more likely to happen, to show the absurdity of this construction. Congress have assumed jurisdiction over the Mississippi Territory, and have established a court, composed of three judges, which court is as much an inferior court as the circuit or district courts. Of this jurisdiction Georgia denies the validity. The contest is in a train of settlement. Suppose it shall turn out that the United States are convinced of the injustice of their claim, relinquish it, and restore the territory to Georgia, what becomes of the judges? Their offices, their duties, are gone! Yet they will tell you, we are vested with certain Constitutional rights, of which you cannot deprive us. It is true the territory is no longer yours. You have no jurisdiction, and we have no power, yet we are judges by the Constitution. We hold our offices during good behaviour, and we will behave well as long as you will let us. Is not this a strange situation? You have judges in a territory over which you have no jurisdiction; and you have officers which are perfect sinecures, pensioners for life. Such an absurdity I am sure the Constitution never meant to justify. It is an absurdity equally repugnant to the letter and the genius of the Constitution.

Suppose another case. Suppose, what I trust will never happen, a war should take place. Suppose that a part of the United States should be conquered, and that we should be compelled to cede it to a foreign nation. In this district your jurisdiction is gone; your power is gone; the office of a judge is destroyed, and yet the officer holds his appointment for life; this case may be considered as inapplicable to the United States. It may be said that we have no right to cede a State, or a part of a State. But I believe a different sentiment has been entertained, and perhaps in this House.

But suppose this event to occur in relation to territory not attached to a State. Suppose the Government should find it necessary to establish an inferior court in an island of Lake Superior. Suppose it should be the fortune of war to place in the possession of the enemy, one of the States, and the question shall be, will you give up this territory in the frozen regions of the Lakes; or suffer the State to remain in the possession of the enemy, you being unable to take it from him? If you give up the territory, your court is annihilated, yet the judges claim a tenure in their offices for life; and this in a country that no longer belongs to you: does not such a result strike every mind as absurd? Is it not apparent, that whatever claim such men might have upon the generosity of the Government, they can have no claim to offices that do not exist? Nay, further, it might, upon the construction now contended for, be insisted that the Constitution forbids you to make a peace upon those terms; that by ceding an inconsiderable territory which you did not want, to secure a whole State, you would abolish the office of a judge, which the Legislature had there erected; that this would be an express violation of your Constitution; and therefore you must leave a whole State in the possession of the enemy, unless this judge would give you leave to make terms by resigning his office!

I believe, sir, that we should not differ much, if we came to a proper understanding of the true principle on which this question depends. If we establish the principle that from the nature and essence of the public institutions, they are made for the good of the people, and not for that of the individual who administers them, we shall experience no difficulty. Gentlemen, in speaking of a judge, had emphatically called it his office. But it is not his office, but the office of the people. He is only the person appointed to perform certain services required by the public good, and when those services are no longer necessary for that public good, his duties are at an end, his service may be dispensed with, and he ought to retire to private life.

The case had been assimilated to a bridge. But he who builds a bridge does a public good, that entitles him to a growing remuneration forever. But here the good is temporary. The truth is, the judge is more like the man who collects the toll, and who receives the promise of an annual payment as long as he discharges his duties faithfully. But a flood comes, and sweeps away the bridge. Will the toll-gatherer, like the judge, contend, that though the bridge is gone, and the owner ruined, that he shall, notwithstanding, receive his compensation for life, though he cannot continue those services for which his annual stipend was to be the compensation and reward?

But it would seem that the argument urged on this occasion, and the general course of our legislation, had been grounded more on the convenience and emoluments of those appointed to office than on grounds of public utility. First, we appointed six judges of the Supreme Court, divided the United States into three circuits, two judges to ride each circuit, in which, with the district judge, to form a court. The law fixed the duties and the compensation, and gentlemen of the first character were ready to accept the places. The salaries indeed had been thought high; in some parts of the Union they were thought enormous. But a little time passed before they complained of the hardships of their duties; and the law was altered, not so much for the public good as for their personal convenience. Where two judges were required to hold a court, one was now declared sufficient. Thus you continued their full salaries, while you lopped off half their duties. Shortly after you assigned them, under the pension law, inconsiderable duties; and they refused to perform them. Thus, while they showed themselves ready to abate of their duties, they adhered to their salaries. Next came the law of last session, which takes away all their duties. It leaves them simply a court of appeals. And what have they got to do? To try ten suits; for such is the number now on their docket, as appears from a certificate just put into my hands; and the average number on their docket amounts to from eight to ten. Thus, for the trial of the immense number of eight or ten suits, you have six judges, one with a salary of four thousand, and five others with salaries of three thousand five hundred dollars each.

I fear, said Mr. M., that if you take away from these judges that which they ought officially to do, they will be induced, from the want of employment, to do that which they ought not to do; they may do harm. They may be induced, perhaps, to set about that work gentlemen seem so fond of. They may, as gentlemen have told us, hold the Constitution in one hand, and the law in the other, and say to the departments of Government, so far shall you go and no farther. This independence of the Judiciary, so much desired, will, I fear sir, if encouraged or tolerated, soon become something like supremacy. They will, indeed, form the main pillar of this goodly fabric; they will soon become the only remaining pillar, and they will presently become so strong as to crush and absorb all the others into their solid mass.

We have been told, that no State in the Union has presumed to touch the Judiciary establishment, except the State of Maryland. I will not answer for others; but with respect to Virginia, I will answer that she has touched it. Her Constitutional provision for the independence of the judges is nearly similar to that of the United States, and yet she has established, modified, and entirely put down particular departments of her system.

[Here Mr. M. went into a particularization of the different changes the Judiciary system of Virginia had undergone.]

After the particularization, Mr. M. proceeded: And yet our judges, who are extremely tenacious of their rights, did not complain. They thought, as I think, that they should not be removed from their offices that others might be placed in them; and that while they did continue in office their salaries should be preserved to them. And I believe the whole of our Constitutional provision amounts to this; that, unlike other officers appointed by the President, they shall not be removed by him; that their salaries shall not be diminished by the Legislature; and that while the Legislature may continue any particular Judicial establishment under which a judge is appointed, he shall hold that appointment in defiance of both the other departments of Government. A judge may say, I am not to be turned out of office by the President on the one hand, or starved by the Legislature on the other. He may say to the Legislature or the President, and to both of them combined, you shall not turn me out of this office as long as it exists, to gratify your enmity to me, or your favoritism to another person; so long as the interest and convenience of the people require this institution, they are entitled to my services; they shall have them, and I will be paid for them to the utmost farthing, in spite of your displeasure or caprice.

Notwithstanding the remarks of gentlemen, I am inclined to think these ideas of the extreme independence of the judges, and the limited powers of the Legislature, are not very old, but that they are of modern origin, and have grown up since the last session of Congress. For in the law passed last session, that very law which it is now proposed to repeal, is to be found a practical exposition in direct hostility with the principle now contended for, which does not betray that sacred regard for the office of a judge, that is, on this occasion, professed: in that very law will be found a clause which abolishes two district courts. The words of the twenty-fourth section say, expressly, "the district courts of Kentucky and Tennessee shall be and hereby are abolished." Will gentlemen tell this House how this express provision came into the act of the last session; and will they say, that though they voted for this law, yet no power exists in the Legislature to abolish a court? It is true, that it has been said, that though you put down two district courts, you promoted the officers, by increasing their salaries and making them judges of the circuit courts; but the fact is, you have abolished their offices; they are judges no longer of the districts of Kentucky and Tennessee; and they are to every purpose, whatever may be their name, in reality circuit judges. Though you have not lessened their salaries, you have deprived them of their offices. However, therefore, gentlemen may calculate as to the benefit or injury done these two judges, the principle is not affected by any result; their offices are gone. It is not enough to say, that though you destroyed their offices, you offered them others with higher salaries. You took away from them, in express terms, their offices, by abolishing the offices. You had stripped them of their offices, you had robbed them of their vested right, and then, to make friends, offered them a compensation; but whether the compensation thus offered for the deprivation they had suffered, was really equivalent to their loss, is a mere matter of calculation, and does not affect the Constitutional principle. It is proper, however, to observe, that they were no parties to the proposed compromise, and that indeed they had no choice left them. They were obliged to accept of what you offered them, or have nothing. If they did not agree to become judges of the newly organized circuit courts, they could not remain judges of the district courts, for these courts were absolutely and completely abolished.

Were I, Mr. President, to make a calculation on the comparative increase of duties and additional salary, in the case of one of those gentlemen, (Judge Innes, of Kentucky,) I should have no hesitation to say, that the bargain which has been made without his consent, and without his being a party to it, is a very bad one for him. Knowing, too, his particular situation, I am persuaded that if the law had left him any election between his former and new situation, he would have preferred remaining where he was, and, without a moment's hesitation, he would have rejected your proffered promotion, as it is called. This gentleman resides within a very few miles of Frankfort, where, as District Judge of Kentucky, he held his court. Attached to domestic life, and enjoying all its felicities, engaged in, and pleased with, agricultural pursuits, he was never under the necessity, even during the sessions of the courts, to sleep out of his own bed one night, or to be separated a single day from his family. He could every morning give directions for the management of his farm, and return early enough in the evening to see whether his orders were executed. How is he situated under the change which has been forced upon him? Instead of attending one court, almost at his door, your late law obliges him to attend four; the nearest, at Bairdstown, fifty or sixty miles from home. You oblige him to travel through dreary and inhospitable regions to the Northwestern Territory, something short of an hundred miles; and much greater distances to and through still worse countries, Knoxville and Nashville, in Tennessee. In going from one to the other of those last mentioned places, he will have to pass through the country of the Cherokee Indians, nearly one hundred miles over the Cumberland mountains, where he will be exposed to every inclemency of the weather, without a shelter to retire to, for there is not a house or a hut in the whole journey; a journey in which all travellers are obliged, at all times, and of unavoidable necessity, to sleep one night, at least, and from the fall of rains, and rise of water-courses, often many nights, without a roof to cover them from the beating of the storm; and, moreover, where they are liable at every step to be robbed by the Indians, as I myself experienced passing through that wilderness. Can it be supposed, that the five hundred dollars added to the salary of Judge Innes, should, by a person situated as he was, be deemed a sufficient compensation for the additional duties, the toils, the dangers, and the deprivations to which that law subjected him? In continuing to serve his country, I am sure he must have been influenced more by a sense of duty than a regard to private interest, or a belief that the change was, in any respect, advantageous to him.

By the seventh section of the law of the last session, which transforms the district into circuit courts, which melts down the judges and recoins them, it is enacted, that there shall be a circuit court, composed of one new circuit judge and two old district judges, to be called the Sixth Circuit. Have you not then established a new office by the destruction of the old one? Have you not done more? Have you not violated the Constitution, by declaring, by law, who shall fill this new office, though the Constitution declares, article second, section two, "That the President shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint all officers which shall be established by law."

Where were these guardians of the Constitution—these vigilant sentinels of our rights and liberties, when this law passed? Were they asleep on their post? Where was the gentleman from New York, who has, on this debate, made such a noble stand in favor of a violated Constitution? Where was the Ajax Telamon of his party, or, to use his own more correct expression, the faction to which he belonged? Where was the hero with his seven-fold shield—not of bull's hide, but of brass—prepared to prevent or to punish this Trojan rape, which he now sees meditated upon the Constitution of his country by a wicked faction? Where was Hercules, that he did not crush this den of robbers that broke into the sanctuary of the Constitution? Was he forgetful of his duty? Were his nerves unstrung? Or was he the very leader of the band that broke down these Constitutional ramparts?

I shall now, sir, trouble you with a few remarks on the expediency of repealing this law. It has been said, that there is nothing peculiarly disgusting in this law; that there has been no public clamor or excited against it; that it was enacted with solemnity, on calm and deliberate reflection; and that time has not yet been given to test it by experience.

As no member, who has taken part in debate, was a member of this body when the law passed, I will say something of its history. I am not disposed to excite the sensibility of gentlemen, by any remarks which I shall make, or to call up unpleasant recollections of past scenes. But when I hear it said that this law was passed with calmness, after mature reflection, and that we are now, in a fit of passion, going to undo what was thus wisely done, I think it necessary that the public should have a correct statement.

It is true, that under the last Administration when there existed (what I trust will never, in an equal degree, exist again,) an immoderate thirst for Executive patronage, a proposition was made to establish a new judiciary system; a system worse than the present; as it proposed, according to my recollection, thirty-eight judges instead of sixteen. This law was very near passing. It was, however, rejected in the House of Representatives by a very small majority. But it was circulated as a project of a law among the people. It was illy received. It was thought too rank a thing, and met with general disapprobation throughout the United States, so far as I have been able to learn. After this reception, it was softened down to the plan introduced at the last session. What temper accompanied the progress of the bill in the other House I know not, or, if I did know, would it be proper for me here to say? But with respect to the acts of this body, I am not of opinion they added any dignity to our common course of procedure. The bill was referred to a committee, who, though it was very long, reported it without any amendment. Various amendments were offered, some of which were admitted to be proper. But they were not received. One, indeed, proposed by a member from Connecticut, who was chairman of the committee, and was then hostile to the plan, did pass, in the early stages of the bill, but on the third reading it was expunged. All amendments proposed by the minority were uniformly rejected, by a steady, inflexible, and undeviating majority. I confess that I saw no passion, but I certainly did see great pertinacity; something like what the gentleman from Connecticut had termed a holding fast. No amendments were admitted; when offered, we were told, no; you may get them introduced by a rider or supplementary bill, or in any way you please; but down this bill must go; it must be crammed down your throats. This was not the precise phrase, but such was the amount of what was said.

I will say that not an argument was urged in favor of the bill, not a word to show the necessity or propriety of the change. Yet we are told that there was great dignity, great solemnity in its progress and passage!

But there is something undignified in thus hastily repealing this law! in thus yielding ourselves to the fluctuations of public opinion! So we are told!—But if there be blame, on whom does it fall? Not on us, who respected the public opinion when this law was passed, and who still respect it; but on those who, in defiance of public opinion, passed this law, after that public opinion had been decisively expressed. The revolution in public opinion had taken place before the introduction of this project; the people of the United States had determined to commit their affairs to new agents; already had the confidence of the people been transferred from their then rulers into other hands. After this exposition of the national will, and this new deposit of the national confidence, the gentlemen should have left untouched this important and delicate subject—a subject on which the people could not be reconciled to their views, even in the flood-tide of their power and influence; they should have forbore, till agents, better acquainted with the national will, because more recently constituted its organs, had come into the Government. This would have been more dignified than to seize the critical moment when power was passing from them, to pass such a law as this. If there is error, it is our duty to correct it; and the truth was, no law was ever more executed by the public.

Let it not be said, postpone the repeal till the next session. No—let us restore those gentlemen to private life, who have accepted appointments under this law. This will be doing them greater justice, than by keeping them in office another year, till the professional business, which once attached to them, is gone into other channels.

[Mr. MASON went into an examination of the number of suits depending at the time the law was passed, and particularly the number brought within the twelve months preceding its passage; from the fewness of which, and their being in a state of diminution rather than increase, he inferred the inutility of the additional judges.]

He continued: If, on this review, we find the number of suits decreasing instead of increasing; if the courts then established were found competent to the prompt and faithful discharge of all the duties devolved upon them, the law was unnecessary; and, if unnecessary, the additional expense incurred by it was unnecessary; and all unnecessary expense should be saved. It is true that fifty thousand dollars divided among the people of the United States amounted to but one cent a man; but the principle was still the same. It has been very fashionable of late to justify every unnecessary expense by stating each item by itself, and dividing it among the whole people. In this way every expense is held forth as of little consequence! Gentlemen say, in this case, it is only one cent a man! In the case of the Mausoleum, two hundred thousand dollars came to only four cents a man! In the direct tax, it is only forty cents! They talk of our army, it only comes to a few cents for each person, who may sell as many cabbages to the soldiers themselves as to pay it! So in a navy. In this way are the most extravagant expenses whittled down to a mere fraction. But this kind of Federal arithmetic I can never accede to. It may suit an expensive Government; but it is an imposition upon the people.

It has been urged with some force, by the gentlemen from New York and Connecticut, that the small number of suits is an evidence of the efficacy and ability of our courts of justice. I am willing to admit the force of this remark; but I must apply it very differently from those gentlemen. I must apply it to the state of the dockets when this law passed; and from there being very few at the time, I must infer that the system existing then was an excellent one, as it wielded the power of the laws so effectually, that there was but little necessity for enforcing the law against delinquents.

From the remarks made by the gentleman from Connecticut, it might be inferred that we were about to destroy all our courts, and that we were in future to have no courts. Is this the case? Are we contending for breaking down the whole judiciary establishment? On the contrary, we barely say, the courts you had before the passage of this law were sufficient; return, therefore to them.

JANUARY, 1802.

Judiciary System.

SENATE.

This law, which we wish repealed, imparts no new authorities to your judges; it clothes them with no, additional terrors; it adds not to their axes, nor increases the number of their rods. It only enlarges their number, which was before large enough.

The gentleman from New York has amused himself with a great deal of handsome rhetoric; but I apprehend without bearing much upon the question. There is one idea, however, which he has seized with extacy, the idea of a great State kneeling at the altar of Federal power; and he deplures that this spectacle, the most sublime that his imagination can conceive, is vanished forever. But if he will consult those stores of history with which he so often amuses and instructs his audience, he will find still more splendid humiliations. He will find the proud monarchs of the East, surrounded with all the decorations of royalty, dragged at the chariot wheel of the conqueror. In more modern times he will behold a King of England and of France, one holding the stirrup and the other the bridle, while the Pope mounted his horse. If not contented with the contemplation of these illustrious degradations, he may resort to Sacred Writ, to which he so often appeals; and in the very Book of Judges, he will behold a famous King of Jerusalem, surrounded by three score and ten dependent Kings, picking up the crumbs from under his table, and, what made the humiliation more charming, all these Kings had their thumbs and great toes cut off.

But if the gentleman from New York wishes to be gratified with a more modern idea of sovereign degradation, I would refer him to the memorable threat of an individual, a servant of the people, to humble a whole State, a great State too, in dust and ashes. A State upon her knees before six venerable judges, decorated in party-colored robes, as ours formerly were, or arrayed in more solemn black, such as they have lately assumed, hoping, though a State, that it might have some chance for justice, exhibits a spectacle of humble and degraded sovereignty far short of the dreadful denunciation to which I allude! If the gentleman feels, as I know many do, rapture at the idea of a State being humiliated and tumbled into the dust, I envy him not his feelings. At such a thought I acknowledge I feel humbled. If the degradation were confined to kings and tyrants, to usurpers who had destroyed the liberties of nations, I should not feel much commiseration; but when applied to governments instituted by the people for the protection of their liberties, and administered only to promote their happiness, I feel indignant at the idea of degraded sovereignty. I should feel the same interest for any State, large or small, whether it were the little State of Delaware herself, or the still more insignificant Republic of St. Marino.

Mr. STONE, of North Carolina.—The importance of the present question might, I presume, justify any member in delivering his sentiments without apology. But from the able manner in which the subject has already been discussed, I should have been induced to adhere to my usual course since I have been a member of this body, and, leaving its elucidation to others of greater experience and more talents, have been contented with a silent vote. As, however, the State whose servant I am, and whose faithful servant I wish at all times to be found, has instructed her members on this subject, I will endeavor, in the plain way of which alone I am capable, to assign the reasons for my vote. And, in doing this, I rather wish than hope that I may state anything worthy the consideration of this enlightened assembly.

The argument upon this question has naturally divided into two parts, the one of expediency—the other of constitutionality. If the repeal of this law shall be deemed expedient, the Senate will doubtless consider it their duty to repeal it if no Constitutional objection opposes it; but if it shall be deemed unconstitutional to repeal it, then no considerations of expediency can stand in the way of that solemn instrument we are all sworn to support.

Before entering into an examination of the expediency of the repeal, it may be proper to remark, that gentlemen who have spoken against the repeal, whose talents and eloquence I highly admire, have not correctly stated the question. The true question is, not whether we shall deprive the people of the United States of all their courts of justice, but whether we shall restore to them their former courts. Shall we, or shall we not, continue an experiment made, or attempted to be made, I will not say improperly, because my respect for this body and for my country, forbid the imputation; but I will say that the length of time we remained without this system, and the repeated ineffectual attempts made to establish it, presents strong reasons for inferring that there are not those great apparent reasons in favor of it that have been stated. A system somewhat similar to the present had been rejected by the Legislature because they preferred the former system. Another evidence to the same purport is, that during the last session, when the subject was again revived, and the present plan adopted, an amendment was offered, to amend by extending and enlarging the former establishment.

[Here Mr. S. read the amendment proposed, which augmented the number of judges of the Supreme Court, and assigned their circuits.]

This amendment was rejected, and from the vote entered on the Journal of that day, it appears that the difference of votes against the amendment was formed of those gentlemen who were nominated to appointments made vacant by the promotions under the new law. I do not state this circumstance as an evidence that these gentlemen were influenced by improper motives; but to show that the manner in which the new system was formed was not calculated to establish, in the public mind, a decided preference of it over the old system. Having made these remarks on the great deliberation said to have been manifested in the adoption of this plan, I hope I may be permitted to express my perfect coincidence with the gentleman from Connecticut, that courts are necessary for the administration of justice, and that, without them, our laws would be a dead letter.

But it appears to me essential to the due administration of justice, that those who preside in our courts should be well acquainted with the laws which are to guide their decisions. And, I apprehend, that no way is so much calculated to impart this knowledge, as a practical acquaintance with them, by attending courts in the several States, and hearing gentlemen who are particularly acquainted with them, explain and discuss them. It is, therefore, absolutely necessary, in my mind, that the judges of the Supreme Court, whose power controls all the other tribunals, and on whose decisions rest the property, the reputation, the liberty, and the lives of our citizens, should, by riding the circuit, render themselves practically acquainted with their duties. It is well known, that the knowledge of the laws of a State is not to be suddenly acquired, and it is reasonable to conclude, that that knowledge is most correctly possessed by men whose whole lives have been devoted to the acquisition. It is also perfectly well known, that the knowledge of the modes and principles of practice in the different States, or of any State, is most effectually to be acquired in courts, where gentlemen of skill and experience apply those principles to use upon existing points.

This defect, then, of the present plan, is, in my opinion, so radical, that, of itself, it would decide, with me, the question of expediency.

With regard to the expense of this new system, I will say, that it weighs as much as it is worth. The single consideration of an expenditure of thirty thousand dollars may not be deemed of much importance, when weighed with the benefits derived from an administration of justice over this extensive country. If this great object can be better effected with the additional expense, then it is proper to consider whether the amelioration is worth the price; but, if it is not better effected, it surely cannot be the wish of any gentleman to incur a useless expense. If, when this law passed, the business, to the transaction of which the old courts were fully competent, was lessening, then surely there was no occasion for additional tribunals.

The more important consideration involves the Constitutional question: Can we, according to that sacred instrument, repeal this law, and destroy the offices created by it? If we cannot, I hope the Senate will reject the proposition on your table. But if we can, as on examination I think we may, I trust the resolution will be adopted.

The gentleman from Kentucky, who introduced this subject, has so fully and forcibly stated that part of the argument which establishes that the office of judge, being declared by the Constitution to be during good behaviour, must evidently apply to existing offices, not to contest the power of the Legislature in doing away offices, that I shall not touch it.

I have taken a view of the Constitution, which, though new in this argument, appears to me to be correct and conclusive. The fourth section of the second article of that Constitution declares,

‘that “the President, the Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.”’

This section being added to the article establishing the Executive power, evidently operates as a restraint or curb to that power, to prevent the President, Vice President, or any officer in the appointment of the President, from remaining in office, when, in the opinion of the Legislature, the public good requires them to be displaced. The practical construction put upon this article, in connexion with other parts of the Constitution, is, that all officers in the appointment of the President may be removed at his will; but that those officers, together with himself and Vice President, shall be removed upon impeachment and conviction, by the Legislature. No part of the Constitution expressly gives the power of removal to the President; but a construction has been adopted and practised upon from necessity, giving him that power in all cases in which he is not expressly restrained from the exercise of it. The judges afford an instance in which he is expressly restrained from removal; it being declared, by the first section of the third article of the Constitution, that the judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour. They doubtless shall, (as against the President’s power to retain them in office,) in common with other offices of his appointment, be removed from office by impeachment and conviction; but it does not follow that they might not be removed by other means. They shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and they shall be removed from office upon impeachment and conviction of treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors. If the words, impeachment of high crimes and misdemeanors, be understood according to any construction of them hitherto received and established, it will be found, that although a judge, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, is always guilty of misbehaviour in office, yet that of the various species of misbehaviour in office, which may render it exceedingly improper that a judge should continue in office, many of them are neither treason, nor bribery, nor can they be properly dignified by the appellation of high crimes and misdemeanors; and for the impeachment of which no precedent can be found; nor would the words of the Constitution justify such impeachment.

To what source, then, shall we resort for a knowledge of what constitutes this thing, called misbehaviour in office? The Constitution, surely, did not intend that a circumstance so important as the tenure by which the judges hold their offices, should be incapable of being ascertained. Their misbehaviour certainly is not an impeachable offence; still it is the ground upon which the judges are to be removed from office. The process of impeachment, therefore, cannot be the only one by which the judges may be removed from office, under, and according to the Constitution. I take it, therefore, to be a thing undeniable, that there resides somewhere in the Government a power to declare what shall amount to misbehaviour in office, by the judges, and to remove them from office for the same, without impeachment. The Constitution does not prohibit their removal by the Legislature, who have the power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States. But, says the gentleman from New York, the judges are officers instituted by the Constitution, to save the people from their greatest enemies, themselves; and therefore, they should be entirely independent of, and beyond the control of the Legislature. If such was the design of the wise men who framed and adopted the Constitution, can it be presumed they would have provided so ineffectual a barrier as these judges can readily be shown to be? It is allowed, on all hands, the Legislature may modify the courts: they may add judges, they may fix the times at which the courts shall sit, &c. Suppose the Legislature to have interests distinct from the people, and the judges to stand in the way of executing any favorite measure—Can anything be more easy than for the Legislature to declare that the courts, instead of being held semi-annually, or oftener, shall be held only once in six, eight, ten, or twenty years? Or, in order to free themselves from the opposition of the present Supreme Court, to declare, that court shall hereafter be held by thirteen judges. An understanding between the President and the Senate would make it practicable to fill the new offices with men of different views and opinions from those now in office. And what, in either case, would become of this boasted protection of the people against themselves? I cannot conceive the Constitution intended so feeble a barrier; a barrier so easily evaded.

SENATE.

What danger is there to the people from the Legislature which the courts can control? The means of oppression nearest at hand to the Legislature, and which afford the strongest temptation to their use, are, the raising extravagant and unnecessary sums of money, and the embodying large and useless armies. Can the courts oppose effectual checks to these powers? I presume not. The Constitution permits their exercise to any extent within the discretion of the Legislature.

The objects of courts of law, as I understand them, are, to settle questions of right between suitors; to enforce obedience to the laws, and to protect the citizens against the oppressive use of power in the Executive offices. Not to protect them against the Legislature, for that I think I have shown to be impossible, with the powers which the Legislature may safely use and exercise; and because the people have retained, in their own hands, the power of controlling and directing the Legislature, by their immediate and mediate elections of President, Senate, and House of Representatives.

It is not alone the sixteen rank and file, which the gentleman from New York has so ludicrously depicted, that I apprehend immediate danger from, but it is the principle which converts the office of judge into an hospital of incurables, and declares, that an expiring faction, after having lost the public confidence, may add to those sixteen, until they become sixteen hundred or sixteen thousand; and that the restored good sense of the Legislature, the whole Government and Constitution, retains no means of casting them off, but by destroying itself, and resorting to revolutionary principles. The Legislature may repeal unnecessary taxes, may disband useless and expensive armies, may declare they will no longer be bound by the stipulations of an oppressive treaty; and if war should follow, the Constitution is still safe. But if the construction which gentlemen contend for, be correct, a band of drones, to any amount in number, under the denomination of judges, may prey upon the substance of the people, and the Government retains not the power to remove them but by destroying the Constitution itself.

I beseech this enlightened assembly to pause before they adopt a construction capable of producing so great a mischief, and so ineffectual to the ends proposed.

The question is not now, as it would seem from the arguments of gentlemen, they understood it to be, whether we shall abolish offices without compensating the officers for the sacrifices they may have made. If a proposal to compensate them shall be brought forward, the Legislature will surely do what honor and justice shall require.

If I possessed equal powers of speech with the gentleman from Connecticut, I might be tempted to make as impressive an address to the feelings of the Senate. Sure I am I feel as deep an interest in, and solicitude for, the Constitution as that gentleman. I view it, with him, as the bond of our Union, and the foundation of our safety. But it must be supported on reasonable and practical grounds. My understanding is incapable of seeing how the absurdities and evils of the construction contended for can be avoided. I hope, therefore, that the power of the Legislature to put down as well as to build up courts of justice, as the public good may require, will be established.

Not having accustomed myself to deliver my sentiments in this or the other branch of the Legislature, I may not have comprised them in so short a compass, nor in such orderly shape, as would be proper in submitting them to this enlightened assembly. If, however, I have succeeded in stating intelligibly the grounds of my conviction, I am satisfied. If my remarks have contributed to elucidate the subject to others, I shall rejoice; but if, failing in this, they also are mixed with error, I trust gentlemen will set them right.

THURSDAY, January 14.

The Senate took into consideration the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st of December last, authorizing the Secretary of State to furnish the members of both Houses with a copy of the laws of the sixth Congress, and concurred therein.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to some and disagree to other amendments of the Senate, to the bill concerning the library for the use of both Houses of Congress. They have passed a bill authorizing the discharge of John Hobby from his confinement; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read, and ordered to the second reading.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 6th instant, that the act of Congress passed on the 13th day of February, 1801, entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States," ought to be repealed.

Mr. OLCOTT, of New Hampshire, said this subject was of the most important kind, and though many able arguments had been already offered, he could not pass it over with a silent vote.

It has been suggested that the act now proposed to be repealed, came in on the influx of passion, and that the influx of reason should sweep it away. He did not know that this was the case. Some gentlemen contend that it was adopted with great deliberation.

He thought the reasons for a repeal of this law insufficient. It is not said, that if the Constitution vests a right to office in the judges, that we can affect them. He thought the Constitution did vest the right, and he held it to be sacred.

The provisions of the Constitution appeared to him so plain, that they scarcely admitted of illustration. He who undertakes to explain the text, must find more explicit terms than those contained in it. He could not find any.

After dwelling upon the different provisions of the Constitution, Mr. O. went upon the question of expediency, at some length, and concluded that a repeal was as inexpedient as unconstitutional.

Mr. COCKE, of Tennessee, followed Mr. OLCOTT. He said he was sorry gentlemen attempted to make quack doctors of them, by saying we may give a wound but cannot heal it. He wished the Senate to inquire whether the law now proposed to be repealed was Constitutional or not. If it was not, we should act like honest men, acknowledge that we have violated the Constitution, and restore it to its purity by repealing the law. Let us recur to the journals of 1799, and see what was the understanding of these champions of our liberties, and whether they have not since changed. The journals would prove that the judges were to mix with the Legislature, were to be locked up in a closet, and to declare who was to be our Executive Magistrate.

[Mr. COCKE here went into an examination of the arguments on the Constitutional point.]

We have been told that the nation is to look up to these immaculate judges to protect their liberties; to protect the people against themselves. This was novel, and what result did it lead to? He shuddered to think of it. Were there none of these judges ready to plunge their swords in the American heart? He did not think it proper to be alarmed by the terrors held out. He wished to know no man; to take things as they are. But if gentleman will attack, they must expect a reply.

Mr. COCKE then dilated upon the several points of the discussion, and concluded with the expression of the hope that the Legislature would repeal the law, and that they would not give way to the ideas of gentlemen, that the Government was made for a chosen few, for the judges, to whom we are to look up for every thing.

Mr. MORRIS.—Mr. President, I had fostered the hope that some gentleman, who thinks with me, would have taken upon himself the task of replying to the observations made yesterday and this morning, in favor of the motion on your table.—But since no gentleman has gone so fully into the subject as it seems to require, I am compelled to request your attention.

We were told yesterday, by the honorable member from Virginia, that our objections were calculated for the bystanders, and made with a view to produce effect upon the people at large. I know not for whom this charge is intended. I certainly recollect no such observations. As I was personally charged with making a play upon words, it may have been intended for me. But surely, sir, it will be recollected that I declined that paltry game, and declared that I considered the verbal criticism which had been relied on, as irrelevant. If I can recollect what I said, from recollecting well what I thought, and meant to say, sure I am that I uttered nothing in the style of an appeal to the people. I hope no member of this House has so poor a sense of its dignity as to make such an appeal. As to myself, it is now near thirty years since I was called into public office; during that period I have frequently been the servant of the people, always their friend; but at no one moment of my life their flatterer, and God forbid that I ever should be. When the honorable gentleman considers the course we have taken, he must see that the observation he has thus pointed, can light on no object. I trust that it did not flow from the consciousness of his own intentions. He, I hope, had no view of this sort. If he had, he was much, very much mistaken. Had he looked round upon those who honor us with their attendance he would have seen that the splendid flashes of his wit excited no approbatory smile. The countenances of those by whom we were surrounded, presented a different spectacle. They were impressed with the dignity of this House; they perceived in it the dignity of the American people, and felt, with high and manly sentiment, their own participation.

We have been told, sir, by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, that there is no independent part of this Government. That in popular Governments the force of every department, as well as the Government itself, must depend upon popular opinion. And the honorable member from North Carolina has informed us that there is no check for the overbearing powers of the Legislature but public opinion; and he has been pleased to notice a sentiment I had uttered—a sentiment which not only fell from my lips, but which flowed from my heart. It has, however, been misunderstood and misapplied. After reminding the House of the dangers to which popular governments are exposed, from the influence of designing demagogues upon popular passion, I took the liberty to say, that we, we the Senate of the United States, are assembled here to save the people from their most dangerous enemy, to save them from themselves; to guard them against the baneful effects of their own precipitation, their passion, their misguided zeal. 'Tis for these purposes that all our Constitutional checks are devised. If this be not the language of the Constitution, the Constitution is all nonsense. For why are the Senators chosen by communities, and the Representatives directly by the people? Why are the one chosen for a longer term than the other? Why give one branch of the Legislature a negative upon the acts of the other? Why give the President a right to arrest the proceedings of both, till two-thirds of each should concur? Why all these multiplied precautions, unless to check and control that impetuous spirit, that headlong torrent of opinion, which has swept away every popular Government that ever existed?

With the most respectful attention, I heard the declaration of the gentleman from Virginia, of his own sentiment. "Whatever," said he, "may be my opinion of the Constitution, I hold myself bound to respect it." He disdained, sir, to profess an attachment he did not feel, and I accept his candor as a pledge for the performance of his duty: But he will admit this necessary inference from that frank confession, that although he will struggle (against his inclination) to support the Constitution, even to the last moment; yet, when in spite of all his efforts it shall fall, he will rejoice in its destruction. Far different are my feelings. It is possible that we are both prejudiced, and that, in taking the ground on which we respectively stand, our judgments are influenced by the sentiments which glow in our hearts. I, sir, wish to support this Constitution, because I love it; and I love it, because I consider it as the bond of our union; because in my soul I believe that on it depends our harmony and our peace; that without it we should soon be plunged in all the horrors of civil war; that this country would be deluged with the blood of its inhabitants, and a brother's hand raised against the bosom of a brother.

After these preliminary remarks, I hope I shall be indulged while I consider the subject in reference to the two points which have been taken, the expediency and the constitutionality of the repeal.

In considering the expediency, I hope I shall be pardoned for asking your attention to some parts of the Constitution, which have not yet been dwelt upon, and which tend to elucidate this part of our inquiry. I agree fully with the gentleman, that every section, every sentence, and every word of the Constitution, ought to be deliberately weighed and examined; nay, I am content to go along with him, and give its due value and importance to every stop and comma. In the beginning we find a declaration of the motives which induced the American people to bind themselves by this compact. And in the fore-ground of that declaration, we find these objects specified, "to form a more perfect union, to establish justice, and to insure domestic tranquillity." But how are these objects effected? The people intended to establish justice. What provision have they made to fulfil that intention? After pointing out the courts which should be established, the second section of the third article informs us:

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States; and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects.

"In all cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make."

Thus then we find that the judicial power shall extend to a great variety of cases, but that the Supreme Court shall have only appellate jurisdiction in all admiralty and maritime causes, in all controversies between the United States and private citizens, between citizens of different States, between citizens of the same State claiming lands under different States, and between a citizen of the United States and foreign States, citizens, or subjects. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky, who made the motion on your table, has told us that the Constitution, in its judiciary provisions, contemplated only those cases which could not be tried in the State courts. But he will, I hope, pardon me when I contend that the Constitution did not merely contemplate, but did, by express words, reserve to the national tribunals a right to decide, and did secure to the citizens of America a right to demand their decision, in many cases evidently cognizable in the State courts. And what are these cases? They are those in respect to which it is by the Constitution presumed that the State courts would not always make a cool and calm investigation, a fair and just decision. To form, therefore, a more perfect union, and to insure domestic tranquillity, the Constitution has said there shall be courts of the Union to try causes, by the wrongful decision of which the Union might be endangered or domestic tranquillity be disturbed. And what courts? Look again at the cases designated. The Supreme Court has no original jurisdiction. The Constitution has said that the judicial powers shall be vested in the supreme and inferior courts. It has declared that the judicial power so vested shall extend to the cases mentioned, and that the Supreme Court shall not have original jurisdiction in those cases. Evidently, therefore, it has declared that they shall

(in the first instance) be tried by inferior courts, with appeal to the Supreme Court. This, therefore, amounts to a declaration, that the inferior courts shall exist. Since, without them, the citizen is deprived of those rights for which he stipulated, or rather those rights verbally granted would be actually withheld; and that great security of our Union, that necessary guard of our tranquility, be completely paralyzed, if not destroyed. In declaring then that these tribunals shall exist, it equally declares that the Congress shall ordain and establish them. I say they shall; this is the evident intention, if not the express words, of the Constitution. The Convention in framing, the American people in adopting, that compact, did not, could not presume, that the Congress would omit to do what they were thus bound to do. They could not presume, that the Legislature would hesitate one moment, in establishing the organs necessary to carry into effect those wholesome, those important provisions.

The honorable member from Virginia has given us a history of the judicial system, and in the course of it has told us, that the judges of the Supreme Court knew, when they accepted their offices, the duties they had to perform, and the salaries they were to receive. He thence infers, that if again called on to do the same duties, they have no right to complain. Agreed: But that is not the question between us. Admitting that they have made a hard bargain, and that we may hold them to a strict performance, is it wise to exact their compliance to the injury of our constituents? We are urged to go back to the old system; but let us first examine the effects of that system. The judges of the Supreme Court rode the circuits, and two of them, with the assistance of a district judge, held circuit courts and tried causes. As a Supreme Court they have in most cases only appellate jurisdiction. In the first instance, therefore, they tried a cause, sitting as an inferior court, and then on appeal tried it over again, as a Supreme Court. Thus then the appeal was from the sentence of the judges to the judges themselves. But say, that to avoid this impropriety, you will incapacitate the two judges who sat on the circuit from sitting in the Supreme Court to review their own decrees. Strike them off; and suppose either the same or a contrary decision to have been made on another circuit, by two of their brethren, in a similar case: For the same reason you strike them off, and then you have no court left. Is this wise? Is it safe? You place yourselves in the situation where your citizens must be deprived of the advantage given to them of a court of appeals, or else run the greatest risk that the decision of the first court will carry with it that of the other.

The same honorable member has given us a history of the law passed the last session, which he wishes now to repeal. That history is accurate, at least in one important part of it. I believe that all amendments were rejected, pertinaciously rejected; and I acknowledge that I joined heartily in that rejection. It was for the clearest reason on earth. We all perfectly understood, that to amend the bill was to destroy it; that if ever it got back to the other House, it would perish. Those, therefore, who approved of the general provisions of that bill, were determined to adopt it. We sought the practicable good, and would not, in pursuit of unattainable perfection, sacrifice that good to the pride of opinion. We took the bill, therefore, with its imperfections, convinced that when it was once passed into a law, it might be easily amended.

We are now told, that this procedure was improper; nay, that it was indecent. That public opinion had declared itself against us. That a majority (holding different opinions) was already chosen to the other House; and that a similar majority was expected from that in which we sit. Mr. President, are we then to understand that opposition to the majority in the two Houses of Congress is improper, is indecent? If so, what are we to think of those gentlemen, who, not only with proper and decent, but with laudable motives, (for such is their claim,) so long, so perseveringly, so pertinaciously opposed that voice of the people, which had so repeatedly, and for so many years, declared itself against them, through the organ of their representatives? Was this indecent in them? If not, how could it be improper for us to seize the only moment which was left for the then majority to do what they deemed a necessary act? Let me again refer to those imperious demands of the Constitution, which called on us to establish inferior courts. Let me remind gentlemen of their assertion on this floor, that centuries might elapse before any judicial system could be established with general consent. And then let me ask, being thus impressed with the sense of the duty and the difficulty of performing that arduous task, was it not wise to seize the auspicious moment?

Among the many stigmas affixed to this law, we have been told that the President, in selecting men to fill the offices which it created, made vacancies and filled them from the floor of this House; and that but for the influence of this circumstance, a majority in favor of it could not have been found. Let us examine this suggestion. It is grounded on a supposition of corrupt influence derived from a hope, founded on two remote and successive contingencies. First, the vacancy might or might not exist; for it depended as well on the acceptance of another as on the President's grant: and secondly, the President might or might not fill it with a member of this House. Yet on this vague conjecture, on this unstable ground, it is inferred that men in high confidence violated their duty. It is hard to determine the influence of self-interest on the heart of man. I shall not, therefore, make the attempt. In the present case, it is possible that the imputation may be just, but I hope not. I believe not. At any rate gentlemen will agree with me, that the calculation is uncertain, and the conjecture vague.

But let it now, for argument sake, be admitted, saving always the reputation of honorable men, who are not here to defend themselves. Let it, I say, for argument sake be admitted, that the gentlemen alluded to acted under the influence of improper motives. What then? Is a law that has received the varied assent required by the Constitution, and is clothed with all the needful formalities, thereby invalidated? Can you impair its force by impeaching the motives of any member who voted for it? Does it follow, that a law is bad because all those who concurred in it cannot give good reasons for their votes? Is it not before us? Must we not judge of it by its intrinsic merit? Is it a fair argument, addressed to our understanding, to say, we must repeal a law, even a good one, if the enacting of it may have been effected in any degree by improper motives? Or is the judgment of this House so feeble, that it may not be trusted?

SENATE.

Gentlemen tell us, however, that the law is materially defective, nay, that it is unconstitutional. What follows? Gentlemen bid us repeal it. But is this just reasoning? If the law be only defective, why not amend? And if unconstitutional, why repeal? In this case no repeal can be necessary; the law is in itself void; it is a mere dead letter.

To show that it is unconstitutional, a particular clause is pointed out, and an inference is made, as in the case of goods, where, because there is one contraband article on board, the whole cargo is forfeited. Admit for a moment, that the part alluded to were unconstitutional, this would in no wise affect the remainder. That part would be void, or, if you think proper, you can repeal that part.

Let us, however, examine the clause objected to on the ground of the Constitution. It is said, that by this law the district judges in Tennessee and Kentucky are removed from office by making them circuit judges. And again, that you have by law appointed two new offices, those of circuit judges, and filled them by law, instead of pursuing the mode of appointment prescribed by the Constitution. To prove all this, the gentleman from Virginia did us the favor to read those parts of the law which he condemns, and if I can trust to my memory, it is clear, from what he read, that the laws does not remove these district judges, neither does it appoint them to the office of circuit judges. It does indeed put down the district courts; but is so far from destroying the offices of district judge, that it declares the persons filling those offices shall perform the duty of holding the circuit courts. And so far is it from appointing circuit judges, that it declares the circuit courts shall be held by the district judges. But gentlemen contend, that to discontinue the district courts, was in effect to remove the district judge. This, sir, is so far from being a just inference from the law, that the direct contrary follows as a necessary result; for it is on the principle that these judges continue in office after their courts are discontinued, that the new duty of holding other courts is assigned to them. But gentlemen say, this doctrine militates with the principles we contend for. Surely not. It must be recollected, sir, that we have repeatedly admitted the right of the Legislature to change, alter, modify, and amend the judiciary system, so as best to promote the interests of the people. We only contend, that you shall not exceed or contravene the authority by which you act. But, say gentlemen, you forced this new office on the district judges, and this is in effect a new appointment. I answer, that the question can only arise on the refusal of those judges to act. But is it unconstitutional to assign new duties to officers already existing? I fear that if this construction be adopted, our labors will speedily end; for we shall be so shackled, that we cannot move. What is the practice? Do we not every day call upon particular officers to perform duties not previously assigned to, or required of them? And must the Executive in every such case make a new appointment?

But as a further reason to restore, by repealing this law, the old system, an honorable member from North Carolina has told us, the judges of the Supreme Court should attend in the States, to acquire a competent knowledge of local institutions, and for this purpose should continue to ride the circuits. I believe there is great use in sending young men to travel; it tends to enlarge their views, and give them more liberal ideas than they might otherwise possess. Nay, if they reside long enough in foreign countries, they may become acquainted with the manners of the people, and acquire some knowledge of their civil institutions. But I am not quite convinced that riding rapidly from one end of this country to the other is the best way to study law. I am inclined to believe that knowledge may be more conveniently acquired in the closet than in the high road. It is moreover to be presumed, that the First Magistrate would, in selecting persons to fill these offices, take the best characters from the different parts of the country, who already possess the needful acquirements. But admitting that the President should not duly exercise, in this respect, his discretionary powers, and admitting that the ideas of the gentleman are correct, how wretched must be our condition! These, our judges, when called on to exercise their functions, would but begin to learn their trade, and that too at a period of life when the intellectual powers with no great facility can acquire new ideas. We must, therefore, have a double set of judges. One set of apprentice-judges to ride circuits and learn; the other set of master-judges, to hold courts and decide controversies.

We are told, sir, that the repeal asked for is important, in that it may establish a precedent, for that it is not merely a question on the propriety of disbanding a corps of sixteen rank and file; but that provision may hereafter be made, not for sixteen, but for sixteen hundred or sixteen thousand judges, and that it may become necessary to turn them to the right about. Mr. President, I will not, I cannot presume, that any such provision will ever be made, and therefore I cannot conceive any such necessity; I will not suppose, for I cannot suppose, that any party or faction will ever do anything so wild, so extravagant. But I will ask, how does this strange supposition consist with the doctrine of gentlemen, that public opinion is a sufficient check on the Legislature, and a sufficient safeguard to the people? Put the case to its consequences, and what becomes of the check? Will gentlemen say it is to be found in the force of this wise precedent? Is this to control succeeding rulers in their wild, their mad career? But how? Is the creation of judicial officers the only thing committed to their discretion? Have they not, according to the doctrine contended for, our all at their disposition, with no other check than public opinion, which, according to the supposition, will not prevent them from committing the greatest follies and absurdities? Take then all the gentleman's ideas, and compare them together, it will result that here is an inestimable treasure put into the hands of drunkards, madmen, and fools.

But away with all these derogatory suppositions. The Legislature may be trusted. Our Government is a system of salutary checks: one Legislative branch is a check on the other. And should the violence of party spirit bear both of them away, the President, an officer high in honor, high in the public confidence, charged with weighty concerns, responsible to his own reputation, and to the world, stands ready to arrest their too impetuous course. This is our system. It makes no mad appeal to every mob in the country. It appeals to the sober sense of men selected from their fellow-citizens for their talents, for their virtue; of men advanced in life, and of matured judgment. It appeals to their understanding, to their integrity, to their honor, to their love of fame, to their sense of shame. If all these checks should prove insufficient, and alas! such is the condition of human nature, that I fear they will not always be sufficient, the Constitution has given us one more: it has given us an independent judiciary. We have been told, that the Executive authority carries your laws into execution. But let us not be the dupes of sound. The Executive Magistrate commands indeed your fleets and armies; and duties, imposts, excises, and other taxes are collected, and all expenditures are made by officers whom he has appointed. So far indeed he executes your laws. But these, his acts, apply not often to individual concerns. In those cases, so important to the peace and happiness of society, the execution of your laws is confided to your judges; and therefore are they rendered independent. Before then that you violate that independence, pause. There are State sovereignties, as well as the sovereignty of the General Government. There are cases, too many cases, in which the interest of one is not considered as the interest of the other. Should these conflict, if the judiciary be gone, the question is no longer of law, but of force. This is a state of things which no honest and wise man can view without horror.

Suppose, in the omnipotence of your Legislative authority, you trench upon the rights of your fellow citizens, by passing an unconstitutional law. If the judiciary department preserve its vigor, it will stop you short. Instead of a resort to arms, there will be a happier appeal to argument. Suppose a case still more impressive. The President is at the head of your armies. Let one of his generals, flushed with victory, and proud in command, presume to trample on the rights of your most insignificant citizen: indignant of the wrong, he will demand the protection of your tribunals, and, safe in the shadow of their wings, will laugh his oppressor to scorn.

Having now, I believe, examined all the arguments adduced to show the expediency of this motion, and which, fairly sifted, reduce themselves at last to these two things: restore the ancient system, and save the additional expense—before I close what I have to say on this ground, I hope I shall be pardoned for saying one or two words about the expense. I hope, also, that, notwithstanding the epithets which may be applied to my arithmetic, I shall be pardoned for using that which I learned at school. It may have deceived me when it taught me that two and two make four. But though it should now be branded with opprobrious terms, I must still believe that two and two do still make four. Gentlemen of newer theories, and of higher attainments, while they smile at my inferiority, must bear with my infirmities, and take me as I am.

In all this great system of saving; in all this ostentatious economy, this rage for reform, how happens it that the eagle eye has not yet been turned to the Mint? That no one piercing glance has been able to behold the expenditures of that department? I am far from wishing to overturn it. Though it be not of great necessity, nor even of substantial importance; though it be but a splendid trapping of your Government; yet, as it may, by impressing on your current coin the emblems of your sovereignty, have some tendency to encourage a national spirit, and to foster the national pride, I am willing to contribute my share for its support. Yes, sir, I would foster the national pride. I cannot indeed approve of national vanity, nor feed it with vile adulation. But I would gladly cherish the lofty sentiments of national pride. I would wish my countrymen to feel like Romans, to be as proud as Englishmen; and, going still farther, I would wish them to veil their pride in the well bred modesty of French politeness. But can this establishment, the mere decoration of your political edifice, can it be compared with the massy columns on which you rest your peace and safety? Shall the striking of a few half-pence be put into a parallel with the distribution of justice? I find, sir, from the estimates on your table, that the salaries of the officers of the Mint amount to $10,600, and that the expenses are estimated at 10,900; making $21,500.

I find that the actual expenditures of the last year, exclusive of salaries, amounted to $25,154 44; add the salaries, $10,600, and we have a total of $35,754 44. A sum which exceeds the salaries of these sixteen judges.

I find further, that during the last year they have coined cents and half cents to the amount of 10,473 dollars and 29 cents. Thus their copper coinage falls a little short of what it costs us for their salaries. We have, however, from this establishment, about a million of cents—one to each family in America—a little emblematical medal, to be hung over their chimney pieces. And this is all their compensation for all that expense. Yet not a word has been said about the Mint; while the judges, whose services are so much greater, and of so much more importance to the community, are to be struck off at a blow, in order to save an expense which, compared with the object, is pitiful. What conclusion then are we to draw from this predilection?

I will not pretend to assign to gentlemen the motives by which they may be influenced; but if I should permit myself to make the inquiry, the style of many observations, and more especially the manner, the warmth, the irritability, which have been exhibited on this occasion, would lead to a solution of the problem. I had the honor, sir, when I addressed you the other day to observe, that I believed the universe could not afford a spectacle more sublime than the view of a powerful State kneeling at the altar of justice and sacrificing there her passion and her pride; that I once fostered the hope of beholding that spectacle of magnanimity in America. And now what a world of figures has the gentleman from Virginia formed on his misapprehension of that remark. I never expressed anything like exultation at the idea of a State ignominiously dragged in triumph at the heels of your judges. But permit me to say, the gentleman's exquisite sensibility on that subject, his alarm and apprehension, all show his strong attachment to State authority. Far be it from me, however, to charge the gentleman with improper motives. I know that his emotions arise from one of those imperfections in our nature, which we cannot remedy. They are excited by causes which have naturally made him hostile to this Constitution, though his duty compels him reluctantly to support it. I hope, however, that those gentlemen who entertain different sentiments, and who are less irritable on the score of State dignity, will think it essential to preserve a Constitution, without which the independent existence of the States themselves will be but of short duration.

This, sir, leads me to the second object I had proposed. I shall therefore pray your indulgence, while I consider how far this measure is Constitutional. I have not been able to discover the expediency, but will now, for argument's sake, admit it; and here, I cannot but express my deep regret for the situation of an honorable member from North Carolina. Tied fast, as he is, by his instructions, arguments, however forcible, can never be effectual. I ought, therefore, to wish, for his sake, that his mind may not be convinced by anything I shall say; for hard indeed would be his condition, to be bound by the contrariant obligations of an order and an oath. I cannot, however, but express my profound respect for the talents of those who gave him his instructions, and who, sitting at a distance, without hearing the arguments, could better understand the subject than their Senator on this floor, after full discussion.

The honorable member from Virginia has repeated the distinction before taken between the supreme and the inferior tribunals; he has insisted on the distinction between the words shall and may; has inferred from that distinction, that the judges of the inferior courts are subjects of Legislative discretion; and has contended that the word may includes all power respecting the subject to which it is applied, consequently to raise up and to put down, to create and to destroy. I must entreat your patience, sir, while I go more into this subject than I ever supposed would be necessary. By the article so often quoted, it is declared, "that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time establish." I beg leave to call your attention to what I have already said of these inferior courts. That the original jurisdiction of various subjects being given exclusively to them, it became the bounden duty of Congress to establish such courts. I will not repeat the argument already used on that subject. But I will ask those who urge the distinction between the Supreme Court and the inferior tribunals, whether a law was not previously necessary before the Supreme Court could be organized. They reply, that the Constitution says, there shall be a Supreme Court, and therefore the Congress are commanded to organize it, while the rest is left to their discretion. This, sir, is not the fact. The Constitution says, the judicial power shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in inferior courts. The Legislature can therefore only organize one Supreme Court, but they may establish as many inferior courts as they shall think proper. The designation made of them by the Constitution is, such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. But why, say gentlemen, fix precisely one Supreme Court, and leave the rest to Legislative discretion? The answer is simple: It results from the nature of things from the existent and probable state of our country. There was no difficulty in deciding that one and only one Supreme Court would be proper or necessary, to which should lie appeals from inferior tribunals. Not so as to these. The United States were advancing in rapid progression. Their population of three millions was soon to become five, then ten, afterwards twenty millions. This was well known, as far as the future can become an object of human comprehension. In this increase of numbers, with a still greater increase of wealth, with the extension of our commerce and the progress of the arts, it was evident that although a great many tribunals would become necessary, it was impossible to determine either on the precise number or the most convenient form. The Convention did not pretend to this prescience; but had they possessed it, would it have been proper to have established, then, all the tribunals necessary for all future times? Would it have been wise to have planted courts among the Chickasaws, the Choctaws, the Cherokees, the Tuscaroras, and God knows how many more, because at some future day the regions over which they roam might be cultivated by polished men? Was it not proper, wise, and necessary, to leave in the discretion of Congress the number and the kind of courts which they might find it proper to establish for the purpose designated by the Constitution? This simple statement of facts—facts of public notoriety—is alone a sufficient comment on, and explanation of, the word on which gentlemen have so much relied. The Convention in framing, the people in adopting, this compact, say the judicial power shall extend to many cases, the original cognizance whereof shall be by the inferior courts; but it is neither necessary, nor even possible, now to determine their number or their form; that essential power, therefore, shall vest in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time, in the progression of time, and according to the indication of circumstances, establish; not provide, or determine, but establish. Not a mere temporary provision, but an establishment. If, after this, it had said in general terms, that judges should hold their offices during good behaviour, could a doubt have existed on the interpretation of this act, under all its attending circumstances, that the judges of the inferior courts were intended as well as those of the Supreme Court? But did the framers of the Constitution stop here? Is there then nothing more? Did they risk on these grammatical niceties the fate of America? Did they rest here the most important branch of our Government? Little important, indeed, as to foreign danger; but infinitely valuable to our domestic peace, and to personal protection against the oppression of our rulers. No; lest a doubt should be raised, they have carefully connected the judges of both courts in the same sentence; they have said, "the judges both of the supreme and inferior courts" thus coupling them inseparably together. You may cut the bands, but you can never untie them. With salutary caution they devised this clause to arrest the overbearing temper which they knew belonged to Legislative bodies. They do not say the judges, simply, but the judges of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour. They say, therefore, to the Legislature, you may judge of the propriety, the utility, the necessity, of organizing these courts; but when established, you have done your duty. Anticipating the course of passion in future times, they say to the Legislature, you shall not disgrace yourselves by exhibiting the indecent spectacle of judges established by one Legislature removed by another. We will save you also from yourselves. We say these judges shall hold their offices; and surely, sir, to pretend that they can hold their office after the office is destroyed, is contemptible.

The framers of this Constitution had seen much, read much, and deeply reflected. They knew by experience the violence of popular bodies, and let it be remembered, that since that day many of the States, taught by experience, have found it necessary to change their forms of government to avoid the effects of that violence. The Convention contemplated the very act you now attempt. They knew also the jealousy and the power of the States; and they established for you and for their protection this most important department. I beg gentlemen to hear and remember what I say: It is this department alone, and it is the independence of this department, which can save you from civil war. Yes, sir, adopt the language of gentlemen, say with them, by the act to which you are urged,

"if we cannot remove the judges we can destroy them." Establish thus the dependence of the judiciary department, who will resort to them for protection against you? Who will confide in, who will be bound by, their decrees? Are we then to resort to the ultimate reason of Kings! Are our arguments to fly from the mouths of our cannon!

We are told that we may violate our Constitution, because similar constitutions have been violated elsewhere. Two States have been cited to that effect, Maryland and Virginia. The honorable gentleman from Virginia tells us that when this happened in the State he belongs to, no complaint was made by the judges. I will not inquire into that fact, although I have the protest of the judges now lying before me; judges eminent for their talents, renowned for their learning, respectable for their virtue. I will not inquire what Constitutions have been violated. I will not ask either when or where this dangerous practice began, or has been followed; I will admit the fact. What does it prove? Does it prove that because they have violated, we also may violate? Does it not prove directly the contrary? Is it not the strongest reason on earth for preserving the independence of our tribunals? If it be true that they have, with strong hand, seized their courts, and bent them to their will, ought we not to give suitors a fair chance for justice in our courts, or must the suffering citizen be deprived of all protection?

The gentleman from Virginia has called our attention to certain cases which he considers as forming necessary exceptions to the principles for which we contend. Permit me to say, that necessity is a hard law, and frequently proves too much; and let the gentleman recollect, that arguments which prove too much, prove nothing.

He has instanced a case where it may be proper to appoint commissioners for a limited time to settle some particular description of controversies. Undoubtedly it is always in the power of Congress to form a board of commissioners for particular purposes. He asks, are these inferior courts, and must they also exist forever? I answer, that the nature of their offices must depend on the law by which they are created; if called to exercise the judicial functions designated by the Constitution, they must have an existence conformable to its injunctions.

Again, he has instanced the Mississippi Territory claimed by, and which may be surrendered to, the State of Georgia, and a part of the Union which may be conquered by a foreign enemy. And he asks triumphantly, are our inferior courts to remain after our jurisdiction is gone? This case rests upon a principle so simple that I am surprised the honorable member did not perceive the answer in the very moment when he made the objection. Is it by our act that a country is taken from us by a foreign enemy? Is it by our consent that our jurisdiction is lost? I had the honor, in speaking the other day, expressly, and for the most obvious reasons, to except the case of conquest. As well might we contend for the government of a town swallowed up by an earthquake.

SENATE.

Mr. MASON explained.—He had supposed the case of territory conquered, and afterwards ceded to the conqueror, or some other territory ceded in lieu of it.

Mr. MORRIS.—The case is precisely the same; until after the peace the conquest is not complete. Everybody knows that until the cession by treaty, the original owner has the postliminary right to a territory taken from him. Beyond all question, where Congress are compelled to cede the territory, the judges can no longer exist unless the new sovereign confer the office. Over such territory the authority of the Constitution ceases, and of course the rights which it confers.

It is said, the judicial institution is intended for the benefit of the people, and not of the judge; and it is complained of, that in speaking of the office, we say it is his office. Undoubtedly the institution is for the benefit of the people. But the question remains, how will it be rendered most beneficial? Is it by making the judge independent, by making it his office, or is it by placing him in a state of abject dependence, so that the office shall be his to-day and belong to another to-morrow? Let the gentleman hear the words of the Constitution: It speaks of their offices; consequently, as applied to a single judge, of his office, to be exercised by him for the benefit of the people of America, to which exercise his independence is as necessary as his office.

The gentleman from Virginia has, on this occasion, likened the judge to a bridge, and to various other objects; but I hope for his pardon, if, while I admire the lofty flights of his eloquence, I abstain from noticing observations which I conceive to be utterly irrelevant.

The same honorable member has not only given us his history of the Supreme Court, but has told us of the manner in which they do business, and expressed his fears that, having little else to do, they would do mischief. We are not competent, sir, to examine, nor ought we to prejudge, their conduct. I am persuaded they will do their duty, and presume they will have the decency to believe that we do our duty. In so far as they may be busied with the great mischief of checking the Legislative or Executive departments in any wanton invasion of our rights, I shall rejoice in that mischief. I hope, indeed, they will not be so busied, because I hope we shall give them no cause. But I also hope they will keep an eagle eye upon us lest we should. It was partly for this purpose they were established, and, I trust, that when properly called on, they will dare to act. I know this doctrine is unpleasant; I know it is more popular to appeal to public opinion—that equivocal, transient being, which exists nowhere and everywhere. But if ever the occasion calls for it, I trust the Supreme Court will not neglect doing the great mischief of saving this Constitution, which can be done much better by their deliberations, than by resorting to what are called revolutionary measures.

The honorable member from North Carolina, sore pressed by the delicate situation in which he is placed, thinks he has discovered a new argument in favor of the vote which he is instructed to give. As far as I can enter into his ideas, and trace their progress, he seems to have assumed the position which was to be proved, and then search through the Constitution, not to discover whether the Legislature have the right contended for, but whether, admitting them to possess it, there may not be something which might not comport with that idea. I shall state the honorable member's argument as I understand it, and if mistaken, pray to be corrected. He read to us that clause which relates to impeachment, and comparing it with that which fixes the tenure of judicial office, has observed that this clause must relate solely to a removal by the Executive power, whose right to remove, though not, indeed, anywhere mentioned in the Constitution, has been admitted in a practice founded on Legislative construction.

That, as the tenure of the office is during good behaviour, and as the clause respecting impeachment does not specify misbehaviour, there is evidently a cause of removal, which cannot be reached by impeachment, and, of course, (the Executive not being permitted to remove,) the right must necessarily devolve on the Legislature. Is this the honorable member's argument? If it be, the reply is very simple. Misbehaviour is not a term known in our law; the idea is expressed by the word misdemeanor; which word is in the clause respecting impeachments. Taking, therefore, the two together, and speaking plain old English, the Constitution says: "The judges shall hold their offices so long as they demean themselves well; but if they shall misbehave, if they shall, on impeachment, be convicted of misdemeanor, they shall be removed." Thus, sir, the honorable member will find that the one clause is just as broad as the other. He will see, therefore, that the Legislature can assume no right from the deficiency of either, and will find that this clause which he relied on, goes, if rightly understood, to the confirmation of our doctrine.

Is there a member of this House, who can lay his hand on his heart, and say that, consistently with the plain words of our Constitution, we have a right to repeal this law? I believe not. And if we undertake to construe this Constitution to our purposes, and say that public opinion is to be our judge, there is an end to all constitutions. To what will not this dangerous doctrine lead? Should it to-day be the popular wish to destroy the First Magistrate, you can destroy him; and should he to-morrow be able to conciliate to him the popular will, and lead them to wish for your destruction, it is easily effected. Adopt this principle, and the whim of the moment will not only be the law, but the Constitution of our country.

The gentleman from Virginia has mentioned a great nation brought to the feet of one of her servants. But why is she in that situation? Is it not because popular opinion was called on to decide everything, until those who wore bayonets decided for all the rest? Our situation is peculiar. At present our national compact can prevent a State from acting hostilely towards the general interest. But let this compact be destroyed, and each State becomes instantaneously vested with absolute sovereignty. Is there no instance of a similar situation to be found in history? Look at the States of Greece. They were once in a condition not unlike to that in which we should then stand. They treated the recommendations of their Amphictionic Council (which was more a meeting of Ambassadors than a Legislative assembly) as we did the resolutions of the old Congress. Are we wise? So were they. Are we valiant? They also were brave. Have we one common language, and are we united under one head? In this, also, there was a strong resemblance. But, by their divisions, they become at first victims to the ambition of Philip, and were at length swallowed up in the Roman empire. Are we to form an exception to the general principles of nature, and to all the examples of history? And are the maxims of experience to become false, when applied to our fate?

Some, indeed, flatter themselves that our destiny will be like that of Rome. Such, indeed, it might be, if we had the same wise but vile aristocracy, under whose guidance they became the masters of the world. But we have not that strong aristocratic arm, which can seize a wretched citizen, scourged almost to death by a remorseless creditor, turn him into the ranks, and bid him, as a soldier, bear our Eagle in triumph round the globe! I hope to God we shall never have such an abominable institution. But what, I ask, will be the situation of these States (organized as they now are) if, by the dissolution of our national compact, they be left to themselves? What is the probable result? We shall either be the victims of foreign intrigue, and split into factions, fall under the domination of a foreign Power, or else, after the misery and torment of civil war, become the subjects of an usurping military despot. What but this compact—what but this specific part of it, can save us from ruin? The Judicial power, that fortress of the Constitution, is now to be overturned. Yes, with honest Ajax, I would not only throw a shield before it, I would build around it a wall of brass. But I am too weak to defend the rampart against the host of assailants. I must call to my assistance their good sense, their patriotism, and their virtue. Do not, gentlemen, suffer the rage of passion to drive reason from her seat. If this law be indeed bad, let us join to remedy the defects. Has it been passed in a manner which wounded your pride, or aroused your resentment? Have, I conjure you, the magnanimity to pardon that offence. I entreat, I implore you, to sacrifice those angry passions to the interests of our country. Pour out this pride of opinion on the altar of patriotism. Let it be an expiatory libation for the weal of America. Do not, for God's sake, do not suffer that pride to plunge us all into the abyss of ruin. Indeed, indeed, it will be but of little, very little avail, whether one opinion or the other be right or wrong; it will heal no wounds, it will pay no debts, it will rebuild no ravaged towns. Do not rely on that popular will, which has brought us frail beings into political existence. That opinion is but a changeable thing. It will soon change. This very measure will change it. You will be deceived. Do not, I beseech you, in reliance on a foundation so frail, commit the dignity, the harmony, the existence of our nation to the wild wind. Trust not your treasure to the waves. Throw not your compass and your charts into the ocean. Do not believe that its billows will waft you into port. Indeed, indeed, you will be deceived. Cast not away this only anchor of our safety. I have seen its progress. I know the difficulties through which it was obtained. I stand in the presence of Almighty God, and of the world; and I declare to you, that if you lose this charter, never, no, never will you get another! We are now, perhaps, arrived at the parting point. Here, even here, we stand on the brink of fate. Pause—pause! For Heaven's sake, pause!

MR. BRECKENRIDGE.—It is high time, Mr. President, that the attention of the Committee should be again called to the real merits of the question under discussion. We have wandered long enough, with the gentleman in the opposition, in those regions of fancy and of terror, to which they have led us. They must indulge us in returning and pursuing our object.

I cannot, however, in justice to my feelings, go into the discussion, without making some remarks on the manner with which the attempts of those who are in favor of this repeal, have been treated. It has been echoed and re-echoed at every sentence, that we are attacking a law, matured by wisdom, and upon which the rights and security of the nation depend. That we are about to demolish the principal pillar in the fabric of our Constitution, and thereby dissolve the Union: and we are politely reminded by the gentleman from Connecticut, that the Roman Government, also once the favorite of the world, sunk under the rude stroke of Gothic hands. Without inquiring what has entitled these honorable gentlemen to assume to themselves the exclusive guardianship of the Constitution; and without inquiring what their attachment to it is; I do pretend, sir, and without paying to myself any compliment, that great as theirs may be, mine is not less. Gentlemen may, therefore, for the future, save themselves the trouble of attempting to arouse my fears on this subject, when I once for all assure them, that my duty as a citizen, and my oath as a Senator, are more operative with me, than the warning voice of any man, or set of men, from what quarter soever it may come, and however high the pretensions to experience and patriotism are, which they may choose to assume. But, notwithstanding my anxiety to preserve inviolate this Constitution, I am not to be diverted from my object, by every tocsin of alarm which gentlemen may think fit to sound. Let me not be told of dangers to the Constitution, and of dangers to the Union. Contemptible, indeed, is the basis on which that Constitution rests, poor is the compliment to the good sense and patriotism of the people of America, if that Constitution and their liberties can, as has been contended, be shaken to the centre by the repeal of a single law, of but a single year's duration; suspicious indeed in its origin, burdensome and useless to the community, and affecting simply a few individuals, interested against that repeal, by paltry pecuniary considerations only.

I shall commence the remarks I am about to make, by asking a single question, which applies to all the observations of the gentleman in the opposition. Has any gentleman shown, or attempted to show, that the increase of courts and judges by this law was necessary or justifiable from the state of things, at the time it was passed? They have, I admit, attempted to show by reasoning at a great distance, that they may be wanting hereafter, that our empire is large, that it is populating fast, and that insurrections might happen. Indeed the gentlemen in the opposition have taken different and inconsistent ground. The honorable gentleman from New Hampshire, venerable from his years, and respectable from his talents, tells us, this law was not the offspring of a night, but has been well matured. The gentleman from Vermont requests that we may not prostrate measures from pique. The gentlemen from Massachusetts takes different ground and denies the power of Congress to repeal the law; and the gentleman from Connecticut says, that the original law establishing the judiciary was but an experiment; and that experience was the only sure test of all human contrivances.

Now for the consistency of gentlemen. Some contend that the law was well matured, and ought not to be dispensed with. Others, that we cannot repeal it at all, whether matured or not matured; and others, that it is part of a system of experiment. If, sir, the first law was an experiment, this law is, of course, an experiment upon an experiment. Now for the reasoning of the gentleman from Connecticut. "Experience is the only sure test of all regulations;" therefore you may make an experiment, and even an experiment upon an experiment, but yet these experiments are unalterable. This is really an original notion about experiments; that you may try them to see if they will answer, but whether they do or not, they are fastened on you.

The honorable gentleman from Georgia could not, after two explanations, atone to the gentleman from Connecticut for an inadvertent expression, dropt by him in the warmth of argument, which carried an insinuation that this law was made in a passion. Let the gentleman from Connecticut, therefore, have it as he stated it, that the law passed with great coolness and deliberation; if gentlemen then supposed it was to be an irrepealable experiment, and to be entailed on their country, I will say, it was a wanton experiment; I will say more, it is an experiment which, instead of being justified by a shadow of necessity, was negatived by the existing state of things when it was made; and that it was an experiment never made upon earth before, to try how courts and judges would answer without business. The absurdity, moreover, with respect to this strange doctrine of irrepealable experiments, is increased, because some gentlemen admit, that you may modify and change the law, but not so as to affect the judges. I understand them then on that point to mean, that you may modify and change the law as you please, provided you increase the number of judges, or the expense of the system; but that you violate the Constitution, if you diminish the number of judges, or attempt to economise the system: or, in other words, it is Constitutional to abolish any part, or all of the system, but what relates to the salary part of it; which in plain English would be, "do what you please, gentlemen, with our system; but spare, oh spare those for whom the system was made, the judges."

The gentleman from Massachusetts asks for any instance of an attempt similar to the one under consideration. If he meant of an example of the abolition of courts and judges, which had become unnecessary, I refer him to the examples of Maryland and Virginia, already cited; States composed of one million two hundred thousand inhabitants, and composing more than one fifth part of the Union, who have each exercised that power. An instance, exactly or very nearly similar to the one under consideration, cannot, I suppose, be adduced; for I would ask him, in my turn, if he can show me in the Union, or the universe, an instance of a set of courts created without any business for them to act on, and beneficial to the judges only?

The gentleman from Massachusetts has conceded a point, which is at variance with the principal ground he has taken. He admits, if a judge in a particular district be incompetent from insanity, disability, or other sufficient cause, to perform his duties, Congress might repeal so much of the law as relates to his district, and thereby put down that judge. How is this? If a law can be repealed, and a judge be put down, because he is unable to discharge the duties of his office, cannot a law be repealed, and a judge be put down, where he has no duties to discharge? If, because a judge who cannot discharge the duties actually assigned him, (although by the act of Government) may be dispensed with, is it sound reasoning to say, that you cannot dispense with a judge, although you have abolished his duties? Again, pursuing the gentleman's own case, if part of a law can be repealed, and a particular district and judge put down, what is it that arrests your power, as to all the districts, and the whole corps of judges?

[Here Mr. J. MASON rose to explain, and said the gentleman had misunderstood him. The idea he intended to convey was, that if Congress had power to put down one judge or one district, they had the power to put down all the courts and judges, but that they had no power to do either.]

MR. BRECKENRIDGE said he was sorry he had misunderstood the gentleman; he had so noted his observation; but he would then beg leave to notice an observation of the gentleman from New York, which applies to this part of the subject. That gentleman has admitted that you may remodel your courts for the benefit of the people, but you cannot affect the judges, for they are in (to use his expression) under the Constitution; and he contends that not only the first section of the third article is imperative, but also the eighth section of the first article, which gives Congress the "power to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court." This last section gives to Congress the power also to pass bankrupt laws, naturalization laws, tax laws, &c. &c. Are all these powers imperative also? And after you have established a post-road, passed a bankrupt law, or a tax law, are they all irrevocable, and are the officers created by them all also under the Constitution? The same construction applies to all, and shows them all to be discretionary powers. But this modification is to be for the benefit of the people. Can it be for the benefit of the people never to abolish courts? Two instances have been already cited. And what principle is it which ought solely to actuate legislators in enacting, modifying, or repealing any law, but the good of the people? Gentlemen really argue as if they considered courts made for the judges and not for the people.

Suppose this subject could be discussed by the people and the judges, what would be the language of each? The people would say, these additional courts are totally useless. The judges would reply, (if they hold the same opinions that the gentlemen in the opposition do,) that they are not useless, for they tend to inspire terror, and keep men honest. The people allege there is no business for them to transact. The judges answer, that the country is increasing fast in population, and there will be business, perhaps, by and by. The people contend they ought not to incur an expense without some advantage. Their honors reply, it amounts to but one cent a man, and is not worth growling about. The people, however, declare their determination to abolish these courts, as things for which they have no use. The judges then reply, in the language of the gentleman from New York, "You are a den of robbers, your Constitution is gone, and all men fly your shores."

The gentleman from Massachusetts admits the President has power to remove at pleasure all officers appointed by him but the judges, but does not see the force of my application of it. I apply it in this way: Although those officers have a right to hold their offices at the will of the President, and the Legislature cannot remove them during the continuance of their offices, yet the Legislature can remove without the will of the President, by abolishing their offices. In case, for example, the excise law is repealed, what will become of the supervisors, and other officers created by that law? They will go out with the law; for an extinguishment of their duties will necessarily carry with it an extinction of their offices, whether the President wills it or not.

But a judge stands on more independent ground. He shall not be removed at the will of the President, nor be starved out by the Legislature. He shall be removed from the exercise of his duties for misbehaviour only, whilst exercising those duties; and during the continuance of his office, or, in other words, his duties, the Legislature shall not diminish the consideration annexed to those duties. His independence and honesty in office, therefore, are sufficiently secured against Executive or Legislative influence.

But the gentleman from New York has racked his very fertile imagination to render familiar to us by comparisons this wonderful and unprecedented thing—an officer without an office, a judge without a court, without duties, or without authority. He has likened him to a bridge, to a boat, to the national debt, and to an eight per cent. usurer. I will spare your gravity, and that of the Committee, by refraining to examine the similitude as to the first two objects. What likeness is there between the salary of a judge and the national debt? The national debt is a vested right—a right not accruing for services which may be rendered, but for services or money actually rendered or advanced. It is a debt, the consideration for which we have acknowledged to have received, and for the discharge of which we have pledged ourselves. It is a debt we are under moral obligations to pay, having previously received from the creditors its equivalent. How stands the case of the salary, which is said to be apposite? Is that a vested right? Is that a debt for which the community have received an equivalent? It is neither. It is a debt which, from its nature, the public faith cannot stand pledged to pay, except so far only as the services actually performed require; it being dependent in its very creation on services to be performed, and which may be dispensed with when they are no longer wanted.

Is the case of the eight per cent. usurer more apposite? If the occasions of men induce them to resort to the hoards of usurers, it is a voluntary act; they know its intent and consequences, and they ought, in justice, to be bound by their contract. Although Shylock may not be entitled to his pound of flesh, yet he is entitled to his usury and interest. And the case of the petty usurer stands on the same ground with all those important usurers who loaned at eight per cent. their money and stock to the United States during her late preparations to fight the French.

The gentleman from New York expresses his utter astonishment at the idea of judges and courts being too numerous, and refers us to the example of Alfred, whose courts and judges were so numerous and well organized, and had imposed such terror into his kingdom, that a purse of gold might lie in safety on the highway. I remember reading, long since, of these hundred courts, courts leet, courts baron, &c., and, if I am not mistaken, sir, he had a court of chivalry, too, of much about the same value and advantage in his kingdom as your additional courts are here. But if the gentleman meditates such extension and perfection in our Judicial system, why not resort to the fountain-head, and take example from Moses, who is certainly higher authority. He, sir, established his rulers, or judges, of thousands, of hundreds, of fifties, and of tens; and men, too, says the book, hating covetousness; that is, I presume, having no salaries. But I take it that both Alfred and Moses had a wider range in legislation than this Senate, and therefore their regulations cannot be very applicable.

Judiciary System.

SENATE.

The gentlemen both from New York and Connecticut have pressed upon us the policy of increasing courts and judges, to prevent crimes and wrongs, to protect the weak against the strong, and insure virtue and humanity among the people. I deny both the proposition and inference drawn from it, in the extent contended for. From whence, I ask, do gentlemen draw their authority for such extensive legislation? From whence arises their power to pass these laws to prevent crimes, to protect the weak against the strong, and to punish the guilty? Not from the Constitution, I will safely affirm; for, under it, but three or four species of crime are punishable by Federal laws, to wit: treason, piracies, and felonies on the high seas, offences against the laws of nations, and counterfeiters of securities or coin of the United States. These constitute their powers on the subject of criminal jurisprudence, and are the sum total of our powers, written or unwritten; unless, indeed, the gentlemen draw some of their authority for their extensive notions of legislation, from the lex non scripta of Alfred's country, which I am told some gentlemen consider as attaching itself to our Constitution. But, admitting the proposition to be true, is the conclusion drawn from it well founded, that a multiplicity of courts and judges inspire terror, and prevent litigation and the commission of wrongs? I confess I am now for the first time to learn, that to inspire terror and prevent wrongs you ought to embody an army of judges; and that to support or discourage litigation, you ought to embody another set of men, their general attendants, called lawyers, who, it seems, for the first time, are to become peace makers; who, with their robes and green bags, will strike such terror into the nation, that a purse of gold may hang in safety on the highway. Halcyon days these, indeed, which are promised from a continuance of these judges; and if not visionary, I could then answer the gentleman from Massachusetts in the affirmative, that the millenium was indeed approaching.

The necessity for numerous courts and judges is also insisted on by suggestions that foreign invasions may happen; that consequently great revenues will be wanting, and consequently numerous courts to enforce their collection. This is reasoning at a very great distance indeed from the subject, to prove its utility. But I am willing to indulge the gentleman, and admit that invasion will happen, and annually, if he chooses, and insurrections quarterly; I will then contend, that, until the population of America amounts to five times the present number, we shall not need as many judges as there now are, to administer justice on all the subjects which can rightfully, under the present Constitution, be carried to Federal adjudication.

The gentleman from New York has favored us with another argument on this head, not addressed to the fears, but to the pride of the people, and asks if the paltry additional expense ought to have any weight, when it cannot amount to more than one cent a man? I answer, sir, that one cent a man, will not, to be sure, oppress the people; but this is a very unfair way of appealing to the ability of the people, by showing them among the thousand items which compose the aggregate of their burdens, what each man's proportion is of one very small item. But as that honorable gentleman has told us, "that he considers the government resting on the reason of man, as a solecism," I should suppose, with due deference to him, that the better way would be, to govern this machine, man, to increase the army, rather than the judiciary. Twenty thousand regulars, properly disposed of, would make us as honest as Alfred's subjects, and would cost us only three or four dollars a head. This too is a kind of terror familiar in countries like Alfred's; but an army of judges is a new experiment, as we have been told this law is, and was reserved for the politicians of these, our enlightened times.

Much has been said about the hardship which will arise to judges, who have quitted lucrative employments and taken seats on the bench, considering them as permanent provisions. One gentleman describes them as a venerable set of men, bending under the weight of years, and not possessing the agility of post-boys: another, as men who have been induced to abandon the active and lucrative pursuits of the law. Take them as portrayed by either gentleman. If they are men of the first description, there can be little hardship in permitting them to return to that state of tranquillity and retirement, from which they must have been no doubt reluctantly drawn; and to which their age and infirmities must again invite their return. If they are men of the last description, can they not readily return to those same active and lucrative pursuits which they had quitted? Have their talents and faculties, for the pursuits to which they were bred, been palsied, by a seat for a single year on the bench? And can that single year's derangement of their affairs be retributed only, by a pension of two thousand dollars a year for life? Such calculations and demands must illy comport with the characters of those of the first description; and they are poor compliments indeed to the talents, legal acquirements, and legal standing of the second. But is there no hardship on the side of the community? Is it enough for them to be told by these judges, true it is, you have established a useless set of courts; but we have been lucky enough to get into office, the Constitution protects us there, and get us out if you can? I doubt, sir, this reasoning would not be satisfactory, to men possessing common honesty, and the ordinary notions of right and wrong. It would not, however, be taken as a satisfactory set off against the fifty thousand dollars annually.

The gentleman from New York has contended strongly against an idea which he apprehends is entertained, of increasing the power of the States, by lessening your Federal courts.

I hold out no such idea; it was a surmise of the gentleman. I wish the Federal Government to possess and exercise all its rightful powers, but no more. I wish the States also to be left in the exercise of theirs. I do not wish to see everything valuable extracted from them. I do not wish to see all possible subjects drawn into the great vortex of Federal legislation and adjudication. I do not, in short, wish, as some gentlemen may do, to see one mighty and consolidated sovereignty collected from and erected on the ruins of all the State sovereignties.

It is now growing late, and the Committee must be fatigued; I will trespass very little longer on them. Many of the observations which I have answered, were, it is true, very foreign and irrelevant to the subject. They were, it is true, but the gleanings, as the gentlemen who have preceded me left little for me to answer.

But permit me, for a single moment, to draw gentlemen's attention to the real merits of this question, and ask, have the arguments been fairly and satisfactorily answered by the gentlemen in the opposition; arguments which went to the many difficulties and absurdities which would grow out of the Constitution under the construction against which I have contended; which went to show, that the Constitution could only be fairly and rationally construed to secure the independency of a judge in office during the continuance of that office; which went to show, that the power of Congress to erect inferior courts was discretionary, and was therefore necessarily accompanied by the power to abolish them; that by the construction contended for, sinecure offices for life would be erected under the Constitution; that the absurdity of an officer without an office would exist; that the power of legislation on judicial subjects would in effect be arrested; indeed, destroyed; and that it would produce the extraordinary phenomenon in our Government of an officer not amenable to your laws, to your Constitution, or to the people themselves? I appeal to gentlemen if these have been fairly and satisfactorily answered? They have not.

FRIDAY, January 15.

AARON BURR, Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate, attended.

The bill, authorizing the discharge of John Hobby from his confinement, was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. BALDWIN, J. MASON, and TRACY, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate took into consideration their amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, to the bill concerning the library for the use of both Houses of Congress; and

Resolved, That they do insist on the said amendments, ask a conference thereon, and that Messrs. TRACY and BALDWIN be managers on the part of the Senate.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 6th instant, that the act of Congress passed on the 13th day of February, 1801, entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the Courts of the United States," ought to be repealed.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Georgia, observed, that in the seat* with which he had been honored by the Senate during the preceding part of this debate, his duty had obliged him to pay particular attention to gentlemen who rose to offer their opinions; he had felt himself pleased and instructed by one of the most luminous discussions, in both views of the question, that he had ever witnessed, which he hoped and trusted would guide the Senate to a useful and proper result. In this late stage of the debate it could not be expected of him to be able to contribute anything new or important. But, as gentlemen had so generally thought proper to express their opinions, he would not withhold a public declaration of his own.

He thought the range of this question and the field of argument had been made more extensive than strictly related to the question; but they might be useful in leading to a final determination on the subject of the resolution now under consideration. The remarks that had been made of improper motives and designs, on the one side and on the other, either that there was an intention to urge forward the powers of the Government, till it was carried altogether beyond its principles, or that there was an inveterate system of opposition to it; which sought nothing less than its overthrow, he should take no notice of, as they had already been extended further than he had wished. His respect for worthy gentlemen, with the greater part of whom he had so long labored in our public councils, his respect for the people whom they represented, and for the State Legislatures, who had, on this occasion, preferred them to their fellow-citizens, it is to be presumed, from full experience of their talents and virtues, forbade him to entertain any doubt of their desire to promote the best interests of their country, and to preserve our excellent Constitution, which they are all sworn to support. If, at any time, observations different from these escaped him, he hoped they would be considered as the suggestions of his own infirmity, and not the result of deliberate reflection. His own general opinion on such subjects was, that it is the nature of all delegated power to increase; it has been very aptly said, to be like the screw in mechanics; it holds all it gains, and every turn gains a little more; the power keeps constantly accumulating, till it becomes absolutely insupportable, and then falls in ruins in a tremendous crash, and the accumulation begins again; so that the history of civil society is but a general view of these vast waves following each other, oftentimes in dreadful succession. That this was the tendency of society, he thought appeared in some measure from our own short history, whether viewed in relation to our State or Federal Governments; several of them had already made considerable advances in this course; he knew of none of them that had declined. Though he hoped and trusted that this fatal progression would be slower in our country than it had ever been before on the face of the earth, and that it would allow to us many ages of great political happiness, yet he did not expect it would be found in the end to be an exception to his general remark. He alluded to several instances in the Federal Government, and observed generally, that as we were now in the thirteenth year under the present Constitution, as we had been thirteen years under the old system of the Articles of Confederation, he thought it useful in our reflections to make a comparison between them. During the first period of thirteen years, the Federal Government, as it was called, possessed neither Legislative nor Judicial power, nor any revenue at all; they were not able even to form their own body by compelling the attendance of their members; they attended, or were absent, as they pleased. Their ideas of the encroachments that it was necessary to make on the powers that were then in the possession of the State Governments, appeared to have been very different from ours; they carried on a long and obstinate war, and, as they supposed, had nearly finished a settlement of their accounts; and yet there was much less complaint of a want of power, or uneasiness and struggles for more, at the close of that first period of thirteen years, than at the present time. He should not enlarge on this view of the subject: when he saw that he was speaking in the assembly of the most ancient statesmen of our country, he knew that, though he barely glanced at the ideas, their own recollections would present them in all their extent. The observations that had been before made by gentlemen on this view, had been so general, that he could only meet and qualify them by other general observations, and he thought they did not furnish a foundation to apprehend an overthrow of the Government.

The resolution now under consideration proposes to reconsider and repeal the new Judiciary law passed last session. It does not follow that this is an effort of a general plan of destruction as applied to our Federal Government. All public bodies must, at some times, review their own proceedings, while the maxim remains true, that it is the lot of human nature to err, this must be the case; parliamentary assemblies have provisions for reconsidering their questions, and courts of justice for granting new trials.

The first and most natural source of argument that presents itself on such occasions is, the circumstances in which the act took place; to inquire whether there was any surprise or unfairness, not according to principle or customary form. Gentlemen have had the candor several times to acknowledge, and it was very fresh in his own recollection, that this was the case on the passage of the law which the motion proposes to repeal, that it was verily believed at the time not to possess an actual majority of the votes of the other House, and therefore every proposed amendment was rejected by its friends in the Senate, as they did not consider it safe to send it back open to any question in the House of Representatives. He instanced the proposed amendment to strike out Bairdstown, the place fixed by the law for the court in Kentucky, which was acknowledged to be a proper amendment, and afterwards introduced in a supplemental law. He said he was himself now acting under an impression that the law never did unite here in its favor an actual majority of votes, according to the rules of the Senate and of the Constitution. He then read the rule of the Senate which forbids a Senator to vote on a question where he is interested, and a clause in section six, article one, of the Constitution, which prohibits a Senator or Representative from making an office to hold it himself. He referred, also, to the settled principle in the investigation of truth, that a person's relation of a common matter of fact in a question of a few shillings value could not be relied on, if he had even a remote interest in the result of it. He hoped his assurances would be accepted; that he did not make these remarks to excite any unpleasant sensations. He wished to avoid them; he touched them as lightly as he could, giving them their proper place in the argument; he was sensible they did not prove that law to be a bad one; but they formed the first and the strongest reason why the subject should be reconsidered, which is the main object of the present motion; for it was open to all amendments in its progress.

Another obvious source of argument, Mr. B. said, on this subject of repeal, is, the comparative merit between this new Judiciary law and the old one, which will be restored, if this is repealed, with such other provisions as may be thought necessary. The whole of the discussion at the last session was on this ground; it is familiar to us all; it was then ample and convincing, so as to produce the effect which has been acknowledged; no doubt it would do the same if repeated at this time; it is to be presumed the effect of it is not lost; to pursue it in all its details on this occasion would make the discussion altogether too prolix and tedious. There were, however, two or three points in the comparison, he begged leave a little to dwell upon. In taking a general look at the two systems, the strongest point of distinction which seizes the first view, is, that in the old system the same judges hold the Supreme Court here, and a court in each of the States, with the exception of the States over the mountains; in the new system, now proposed to be repealed, this is not the case; the courts in the several States are held by different judges. This had ever appeared to him a radical and vital failure in the new system; it deprives the judges of the opportunity of a full knowledge of local laws and usages, and destroys the possibility of uniformity; it is also a main artery of healthful circulation in the body politic. In giving a satisfactory administration of a Government over a country of this vast extent, the great object must be to avoid the necessity of dragging the people from the remote extremes, the distance of thousands of miles, to the seat of our Government, or far from their homes, where they cannot have the usual advantages in courts of justice. While two of the judges of the Supreme Court held a court in each State, this was almost entirely avoided, except in some of the largest States. The suits were rarely determined at the first court; at the second court, the judges were considered as bringing the sense of the Supreme Court on the subject; it seemed to give as satisfactory a conclusion to the business as if the parties had been themselves before the Supreme Court. Though gentlemen all appear to submit to the force of this argument, yet they suppose they defeat it by the vague and general declaration, that experience has proved it to be impracticable; that we should have no more venerable judges; that men must be appointed for their agility rather than their wisdom, &c. He averred experience had determined no such thing; very venerable judges had gone through that duty from the beginning of the Government, without any apparent injury to their constitutions, with as few resignations as ordinarily take place among the State judges, and, in fact, with less bodily labor than is required of many members of Congress for a much smaller compensation. He thought experience proved that men equal to the labor, and also well fitted for the office, might be found, rather than give up so indispensable a provision, especially as, under the present motion, additional provisions may be made to render the system more practicable and less laborious. The change that had been made was, no doubt, a great relief to the judges; but we have other and more numerous constituents whose relief must also be attended to.

2. Another strong point in the comparative view of the two systems is, that the new law now proposed to be repealed, attempts to draw off more business from the State courts to the Federal courts. When gentlemen talk of expediency, may they not be asked, what is the expediency of that measure? Will it make a more convenient and complete organization? When they talk of carrying justice to the door of every man, may they not be asked, whether that is most perfectly carrying justice to the door of every man? His situation in the former part of the debate was such, that his duty would not permit him to take notes of what was then said, but if he had the arguments of the gentlemen on this head before him, he should be pleased in applying it to every one of them, to see how they would appear to defeat themselves by the application of this principle. This, said he, goes directly to the great defect in the theory of the Federal Government, which has at all times given uneasy apprehensions to its best friends respecting the final success of this vast and benevolent experiment in Government. The idea of a Continent uniting under a General Government, which should settle general regulations, and do away the most common causes of war, is not a thought so much out of the ordinary subjects of reflection as to require any inventive or profound genius to call it into view. It is readily conceived, that the Eastern Continent, as well as this Western, might have often reflected on the practicability of this vast experiment; the great discouragement which has probably prevented it, has been, that the immense and unwieldy enginery which would be necessary to carry it on, to administer its laws, and manage its money transactions, with tolerable intelligence and fidelity, and keep up the great vital circulation, is not within the compass of human faculties and endowments. If ours fails, it will be from that cause; its wisest and best friends appear always to have been aware of it, and therefore have, as far as possible, directed it to a few great and general regulations, which seem indispensable, and which were least difficult in their operation; but that it should be put to ordinary business, then well done by the States, as though in its nature better suited to it than ordinary Governments, had always appeared to him to be the most unpromising direction that could be given to it. He considered that as the strongest possible objection to the new Judiciary law, now proposed to be repealed, that it was unnecessarily drawing the business from the States, where it was as well lodged, and probably as well conducted, as in any Government on earth, to the Federal establishment, where, if it was possible to conduct it at all, it was not possible to conduct it so well, and so much to the satisfaction of the people, for whom alone Governments are instituted.

The third source of argument which he should notice, was the document No. 8, sent by the Executive. As this had already been the principal topic of argument to several gentlemen, and had been placed in so irresistible a point of view, in support of the proposed resolution, he should add but few words upon it. It is said the document is incorrect; it is sufficiently correct for all the purposes of the argument, which depends not on there being three or four more or less suits in a particular place, but to show that the old Judiciary system was perfectly sufficient for all the business, and that the business was actually decreasing when the system was extended. To this the document is perfectly sufficient and conclusive. On this it has been observed, that there being but little business, and that decreasing, is so far from being an objection to the system, that it is the best argument in its favor; but this proves the perfection of the old Judiciary system, which was the cause of it, and is now proposed to be restored, and not the new, which is yet scarcely got into operation. If the decrease of business proved the necessity of the further extent of the system, in the new Judiciary law, the continuing to decrease, which appears since that time, proves that the system ought now to be still further extended.

Mr. B. said, he would proceed to submit a few remarks on the view that had been taken of the subject in its relation to the Constitution. It seems that this part of the Constitution is considered as capable of different meanings, and from so many different opinions expressed upon it, he had no doubt it was the case. Although Governments of written laws, and written constitutions, are undoubtedly a great and invaluable security to the regular administration of public affairs, yet it must be acknowledged, that, like everything human, they are imperfect; they clearly define and settle many things which would otherwise be afloat; but they do not settle everything; questions will arise in administering them, which occasion honest doubts. When a new law is passed, the most upright and enlightened courts require a length of time to settle the practical questions under it, and to give definitive meaning and precision to all its parts. This must be more likely to occur in written constitutions, which embrace such variety of important subjects, generally in a very small compass. Many questions of this kind have already been so far settled by practice on our Constitution, that they have rarely been stirred of late. Those occasions had been represented at the time, as very threatening to the Government; Congress was then nearly equally divided upon them, and they did not, in the end, prove so disastrous as had been predicted; they had generally terminated in favor of the strict rather than the literal construction of the instrument, not to make the words cover the most that they possibly could. It had been contended in the early years of the Government, repeatedly, and with much earnestness, that the preamble of the Constitution was a grant of powers, and when a measure was proposed, if it could be shown to have a tendency "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, and insure domestic tranquillity, &c., it was Constitutional; the words "general welfare" in article 1, section 8, had been often urged for the same purpose, and as authorizing Congress to build manufacturing towns, a National University, and to carry on any pecuniary enterprises, with the public money; deliberate practice seems for many years to have settled the construction that those words should not be considered as a distinct grant of power, but a limitation of the power granted in the former part of the article, to lay and collect taxes, &c. He instanced also the power of the President to remove officers, and several others to the same effect. It was some reward, he said, for the trouble they had on similar occasions, that the greater part appeared now to be settled, as such instances occurred much less frequently than formerly: the one which now presents itself is new; he expressed his confidence that a result as proper and satisfactory would take place on this, as on former occasions.

He believed there were several points of this nature in relation to the Judiciary on which the other departments of the Government considered themselves as yet to have no settled practice; on which he observed generally, that if it had been intended to convey those distinguished powers which have lately been claimed in their favor, it might naturally have been expected that it would have been done in very conspicuous characters, and not left to be obscurely explored by construction, not enlightened by the least recollection from anybody, on a subject and on an occasion certainly of the most impressive kind, and so little likely to have been forgotten. He said, the extent that is now claimed to those words in article 3, section 1, "that the judges should hold their offices during good behaviour," was greater than he had before contemplated. His own judgment adopted the construction that had been given by several gentlemen who supported the resolution, and which they had illustrated so much at large, and so ably supported, that he should add but few words upon it. The phrase creating or establishing office, is familiar in our Constitution and laws, and may be done by the Constitution or by the Legislature; its attributes are like the ordinary attributes of legislation, to be conducted as the wisdom of the Legislature, and the circumstances of the country, may direct. Office, in its original use, is synonymous with duty. When the system of duties is so particularly defined and prescribed by the Constitution, that the functionary is able to go on in the discharge of the duties, the office is created or established by the Constitution; when this is done by law, it is said to be created or established by law; the first may be of equal duration with the Constitution; when it is created by law it may be of equal duration with the law, but in neither case can it be of longer duration; to suppose it, appeared to him absurd. When it is said, "the judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour," the first and obvious meaning is, that it should be theirs during life, or as long as there was such an office, unless they resigned or were removed for misbehaviour, that it should not be taken from them to be given to another. In such questions of constructions as to the meaning of words and phrases, it is very difficult to prove that they must mean precisely this and nothing else; it was satisfactory to him that this construction fully satisfies the meaning of the words: without doing violence to the other parts of the instrument, it does not interfere with and destroy the words which gave the Legislative powers to Congress. It is known that the importance of the integrity of Legislative power, which is sometimes spoken of under the expression "omnipotence of Parliament," is at least as favorite a part of the theory which we have been most in the habit of consulting, as the independence of the judges, particularly in the extent which it is now proposed to give it. This clause is speaking of the tenure of the office, and not of the existence of the office; that had been aptly disposed of in that part of the instrument which is on that subject, and is to be sought for among the Legislative powers and prohibitions of power.

On the tenure of office, the Constitution says, "the President shall hold his office for four years, Senators for six years," &c., "judges during good behaviour."

All these suppose the office to be in existence, but are not designed to authorize the functionaries to hold over beyond that period, or to affect the power which is given to change those instruments. The judges shall have the highest possible tenure, they shall hold their offices as long as the Constitution of the country, and the constitution of their offices exist, if they behave well. He could not consider the Constitution as contemplating their surviving or holding beyond the existence of the Constitution of the country, or the constitution of their office. It would be a very strained construction to consider that as intended. It would also be a very useless one; it goes to prevent the Legislature from the right to make laws on the subject, as the circumstances of the country may require, without which he did not see how the Government could be carried on, and yet does not secure the judges from intolerable persecutions and oppressions by those laws; in short, it does all the harm and does no good.

The more violent partisans of this theory of independence of judges say, that our construction destroys the principle altogether, that the Constitution might as well have said nothing, that it leaves the judges entirely at the mercy of the Legislature. This is arguing from the abuse of power, and ought not to be admitted. It is not to be presumed that when a Constitution or a Judiciary system is well adapted to the circumstances of the country, and gives satisfaction to the people, that it will be lightly changed or altered, or that it can be put down or destroyed merely to get rid of the officers; they may abuse any other article of power to as great excess; they might prescribe intolerable duties, as has been observed, and thus oblige the judges to resign, &c. He would not pretend to deny but that the words might be taken in a more extensive scale, but he thought this the most natural, and sufficient to satisfy them, and that there are not many pages in the Constitution in which as probable and promising a criticism as the one that has been made on this occasion, might not be taken and introduced to disturb and unsettle our practice. It is to be recollected that this theory of the independence of judges has already been carried by us further than anybody else has carried it, in placing them beyond the reach of removal, on the joint address of both branches of the Legislature; he was not convinced that any important effects had flowed from it, or that experience had as yet determined anything so certain and encouraging on this theory, as, at this time, to warrant a further extension of it by construction.

Another meaning which has been given to the words, is, that the Legislative power on this subject shall remain entire, to institute and shape the courts as they may think proper, with the one exception, that "there must be one Supreme Court;" but that judges, once appointed, are authorized to hold their pecuniary emoluments during life, unless removed by impeachment. This construction does not go to defeat the proposed resolution; the resolution says nothing about what shall be done with the present judges; they may get their full salaries during life, if it is their Constitutional right. He thought that of very small importance in the argument, and hoped those gentlemen would not be prevented by it from voting for the resolution, if they thought it had been sufficiently supported by arguments derived from the nature of the subject, which he thought was the true ground on which the question ought to turn.

But a much more extravagant construction on those words, he said, had been taken; that the words, "they shall hold their offices during good behaviour," were to be considered as a limitation of the power of the Legislature in creating and fashioning their offices; that the offices are to be considered as theirs, as a vested right; that it would be absurd to say they should hold their offices, that they were a vested right, &c., when they might any day be taken away by a change of the Constitution, or a repeal of the law which creates it, and which is the constitution to that office; that you should not kill the man, but might sink the ship on which his life depended. Some also lay particular stress on the words "their offices," as meaning a particular and definite system of duties, which the judges had received from the Government by the contract; that the Legislature had no right greatly to vary or change this definite system of duties, so as to make it very burdensome and oblige them to resign, and in that way affect this all-important provision of the Constitution, the independence of judges. This appeared to him so extravagant, and inevitably led to such a train of consequences, as had been fully stated by those who had gone before him—he was so confident it could not be adopted and practised upon, that he scarcely apprehended any danger from it. To be sure, if the offices are theirs, a vested right, a matter of contract between them and the Government, there is an end to all power in the Legislature to change them, or even legislate upon them, without the consent of the judges; they must survive the law creating them; and they must also survive, even though the Constitution itself should be changed. If any construction does violence to the Constitution, and defeats its most essential provisions, this is the one, and needs to be made the subject of all the warnings which had been addressed to us on those important grounds.

Mr. HILLHOUSE, of Connecticut, observed, that he opposed the passage of the law now proposed to be repealed; but for the purpose of getting rid of a law which he did not like, he could not feel himself justified in tearing out a leaf of the Constitution. In attempting to correct an error of a former Legislature, we should be careful not to commit one, in its consequences, more fatal than the first. He did not hesitate to declare it as his opinion, that not only the law under consideration, but every other that had been passed on that subject, might be repealed; but he was surprised to hear it said that this could be done in a way that should deprive a judge, duly appointed, of his office and salary. The words of the Constitution are direct and positive, that "the judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour; and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office." The Constitution no where says that the Judiciary system of the United States, when once formed, cannot be altered, the courts new organized, old ones put down, and new ones created; that is left to Legislative discretion, under this restriction only, that there shall always be a Supreme Court, and that no judge shall be deprived of his office or salary. To abolish a court, without destroying the office or salary of the judge, has not in practice been found difficult. Most of the States, where judges hold their offices during good behaviour, have been in the habit of doing it; the United States have done it; but in no instance has a judge been deprived of his office or salary, unless in that stated to have recently happened in Maryland; which, if the facts are rightly reported, ought not to be respected, much less imitated by this Senate. By the law of Maryland, courts had been established, and judges appointed, who, by the Constitution, hold their offices during good behaviour. This law was repealed, and, during the same session of the Legislature, a new law was passed establishing the same courts, and almost in the same words of the former law. What could be the object of this repeal? Surely none other than the turning the judges out of office. Could that be less a violation of their Constitution than the passing of a law directly removing from office the same judges? It is too absurd to say that indirect means may be used to effect what might not be done by a direct and positive law, or is absolutely forbidden by the Constitution to be done at all.

Here Mr. H. stated the various laws of Virginia, in which they new-modelled or altered their Judiciary system, by which, said he, it appears that this ancient and important State has ever been careful not to violate the principle here contended for, and had, in no instance, deprived a judge of his office or salary.

To justify such a construction of the Constitution as will warrant a repeal, it is said if a law may pass one session authorizing the appointment of sixteen judges, who cannot be removed, it may be extended to sixteen thousand—arguing that, because the power may be abused, that therefore it does not exist. But will this argument do? Let it be tested by other parts of the Constitution. Congress are not limited in their power to borrow money, or raise armies, which, during the period of one Congress, might be used to the total and irretrievable ruin of the nation. The treaty-making power is vested in the President and Senate, a power which has been recently exercised in ratifying the convention with France, by which is relinquished the claims of the citizens of the United States for spoliation to a great amount; there is nothing in the Constitution that restrains this power or the abuse of it, or that would have prevented the introduction of an article into this same convention stipulating the payment to France of an annual tribute of twenty or thirty millions of dollars, a sum absolutely ruinous to the United States. The same remarks will apply to sundry other powers; yet it will not be said, that because these powers are liable to this abuse that therefore they do not exist. There never was a Constitution or form of Government which contemplated it as a possible case, that the Legislative power should be lodged in the hands of madmen, or which attempted to provide against such an event. Should this be the unhappy situation of any country, there would be no remedy but a resort to revolutionary principles. From whom is this abuse of power respecting the Judiciary apprehended? The Legislature; the same Legislature in whose hands we are told the rights and liberties of the people are perfectly safe. In no part of the Constitution is the President directly vested with power to remove any one from office; on that subject it is silent; the restriction therefore, in relation to the judges, cannot refer to the President, it must have been intended to secure them against every department of the Government. Any other construction would render the restriction futile, and wholly destroy the independence of the judges, who would be liable to be removed from office at every session of Congress. All that would be necessary would be a repeal of the law under which they hold their appointments, which, if the principle of this resolution is admissible, may be done without any violation of the Constitution; it will certainly carry us to that extent. It was most certainly the intention of the Convention who framed the Constitution, to secure the independence of the judges; it was thought by every one to have been done in a most effectual manner, until this new discovery, which is of very recent date, of resorting to a repeal of the law. The independence of the judges is certainly very important to insure a due administration of justice, which in every well regulated Government is considered as a matter of primary importance. Other departments of the Government may be more splendid, but courts of justice come home to every man's habitation; their importance is felt by every individual, to them he looks for security and the protection of his person and property.

The Constitutions of States are limited in their operation, and may be easily altered or amended; different, far different is that of the United States. This is the bond of union between sixteen sovereign independent States, spread over a country of vast extent, influenced by different views and interests; watching with a jealous eye the movements of the General Government; and whom it has been found difficult, and will grow more and more difficult, to unite in any agreement to alter or amend this Constitution, and which, if once destroyed by any important or flagrant violation it is my firm belief will never be renewed.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, observed, that he had been called forth early in this debate rather to defend the State he had the honor to represent, from the unkind imputation of "a violation of her Constitution," (in which he flattered himself he had succeeded even to the satisfaction of the honorable gentleman himself, who, he presumed, from misinformation, had been induced to make it,) than from any desire at that time to enter into the discussion of the merits of the resolution then under the consideration of the Senate. He, therefore, hoped he should now be indulged with a few observations on the merits of the resolution before them, and although it had already occupied so much of the time of the Senate, and had been so ably and so fully discussed by honorable gentlemen of great abilities and experience on both sides, yet he should presume to call their attention to such prominent features of the case as had been impressive on his own mind.

This subject has been brought before us in the imposing shape of a recommendation of the President of the United States, the national, the constitutional organ of the Government, in his official Message to Congress on the state of the Union; a duty imposed on him by the express letter of the Constitution; a duty he was bound by the most solemn obligations Constitutionally to discharge; a duty that renovated and enlightened America had too recently selected him to discharge, to readily to believe he would unconstitutionally abuse.

Sir, this subject has been submitted to the consideration of the Congress of the United States—a body selected for their patriotism, their wisdom, and their virtues—the Constitutional organ of the legislative will of the nation, in order to inform their minds, and point their attention to the great and important subjects on which they were convened to deliberate, on the honest discharge of which everything valuable to America depends. This subject had not been brought before them in a manner to coerce a hasty or an immature decision on the subject, nor had it been left on the vague foundation of suggestion or conjecture, but it had been brought before them in a manner that imposed deliberation, and had been supported by documents that had paralyzed and almost sealed the lips of opposition on the point of its expediency.

But, however imposing the manner, or however incontrovertible the matter on which the resolution was predicated, yet, honorable gentlemen are found on this floor to oppose it as a measure of that Administration they feel indisposed to support, particularly as it implicates the policy of the late Administration, and indeed a measure which was the work of their own hands, which mankind at all times have been prone to admire, and however convinced of their errors, have, with great reluctance, been brought to confess them.

Sir, it would seem by the course of the arguments on the present question, that we had it in contemplation to break down the Federal judiciary altogether, and to subvert ancient foundations, and as if the agents or perpetrators, (as the gentleman from Connecticut has politely called them,) with polluted hands intended to destroy that Constitution they had sworn to support, and to leave the community without a judiciary to enforce obedience to the laws, whereby the strong might give law to the weak; the rich oppress the poor, and the artful and the wicked impose on the weak and uninformed; and all with impunity; and indeed would induce a belief, that they alone had either life, liberty or property to be protected. But the fact is, that the old judiciary system, that has answered every necessary purpose from the commencement of the Government, remains inviolate. It is the new system established at the last period of the last session of Congress—a system whereby sixteen new judges were introduced as circuit judges, several of whom had been promoted to be circuit judges from district judges, to make room in the district courts for gentlemen of Congress, who assisted to establish this new system, and who therefore were by the Constitution disqualified to accept that office, created during the time for which they were elected to serve in Congress, and, as he had said before, thereby indirectly minted offices for themselves, and the favorites of an expiring Administration—a measure resisted by the Republicans in both branches of the National Legislature; a measure which was carried into operation by those from whom the people have revoked their confidence, at the moment their power was passing away, at a time when the business in the Federal courts had declined nearly one-half, and when the Sedition law had ceased to be an engine to restrain the liberties of the press, and to punish men for the expression of their honest political opinions, was all that was intended to be repealed.

Here let me call your attention to the letter of the resolution, which, on reading it, will be found to extend no further than to the repeal of the act of Congress of the last session, by which sixteen new Federal judges had been created, and a system established at the annual expense of $130,000. We are now called on, as the representatives of the nation, as the organ of their legislative will, to determine whether this law, which has been ever odious in the sight of the people, and whose birth was not entirely legitimate, shall be repealed. We are informed by the President himself, that it is unnecessary, and that fact has been established by the document submitted to us on the subject of the judiciary courts of the United States. We are informed also, that on the repeal of this law, and the making some retrenchments in the Naval and Military Establishments, which have been already progressed in, is predicated the repeal of the odious internal taxes; and in this manner, and to effect this desirable purpose, this subject is brought before us. Can we then hesitate to relieve our people from the burden of their odious internal taxes, by the repeal of this unnecessary law? I should presume not, if governed singly by the regard to the public welfare; but we have, notwithstanding, been told by honorable gentlemen, on the other side of the House, that this law ought not to be repealed:

1. Because it is inexpedient;
2. Because it is unconstitutional.

Upon the first point, that of its expediency, he should not detain the Senate longer than to observe, that the document on our table shows, that the old judiciary system, which had been coeval with our Government, and had been in operation from its commencement, had been at all times sufficient for the transaction of all the judicial business of the Union; that the business in the courts had already declined nearly one-half under the old system, even at the moment of the establishment of the new one; also, that it was contemplated to repeal the odious internal taxes—a considerable source of litigation; and that the more odious Sedition law had expired, which they all knew had been a source of considerable litigation, and he was sorry to add, had not placed the judiciary above the reach of abuse; but whether deservedly or not, he dared not affirm; and that the peace we had lately established with France had put an end to another source of litigation, that of admiralty causes on the prize side of the court of admiralty. From this view of the subject, he himself was entirely satisfied of the expediency of the repeal, and had little doubt that every gentleman was equally so, that any evidence could convince.

As to the point of its being unconstitutional: It will be recollected that the President himself has recommended the repeal of this law; an evidence of its constitutionality of so high authority with the enlightened people of America, that if it stood singly on that, it would require a federal host to shake it; but we know there are honorable gentlemen on this floor not disposed to confess their respect for that authority on this occasion. Those gentlemen I will refer to the Constitution itself, from whence I presume it will appear that the power now proposed to be exercised is clearly delegated.

In the eighth section, ninth article, Congress shall have power to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court; in the seventh article, Congress shall have power to establish post offices and post roads. These are the precise expressions by which Congress acquire the power over the subjects of the inferior courts, and of the post offices; there is no other authority given them but by these articles; there is no express authority to abolish either courts or post offices, but the subjects are respectively given to Congress to exercise their legislative will upon, in such manner as should best promote the public good. I would ask gentlemen if Congress have not established post offices without number, and abolished them at their will and pleasure, by virtue of their authority under the seventh article above stated; and I should be glad to hear from whence the authority to abolish post offices is derived, unless from the article that only expressly authorizes their establishment, and whether the authority given over the subject has not in all past times been held sufficient to justify the abolishing as well as establishment of post offices? He then called on the gentlemen in the opposition to point out a difference between the powers of Congress over the inferior courts and the post offices, and to show how it was that Congress could abolish the post offices under an authority to establish them, and not to abolish the inferior courts under the like authority to establish them; and how the same phraseology that is used in vesting the power in Congress over the post offices and inferior courts, can be tortured so as to authorize the abolishing post offices, and not to authorize the abolishing the inferior courts. But we have been told that by the first section of the third article, this business is to be explained; let us examine it: The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their office during good behaviour. By this it has been insisted, that the judges of the inferior as well as the superior courts hold their offices during good behaviour, and that we have no power to pass this repealing law because it would operate to dismiss the judges. He said that Congress, by an extraordinary legislative act, with the concurrence of two-thirds of the States, had a power to abolish even the Supreme Court. He asked, in such case, what would become of the judges? Would they be entitled to hold their offices as judges, when in the eye of the Constitution there was no such office? No, certainly! The Constitution meant, and could mean nothing else than a judge under the Constitution, and the moment the Constitution discontinued the office the judge, under the Constitution ceased to have a political existence, and would not be known to the Constitution as a judge. So, he concluded, by an ordinary act of legislation, the Congress might repeal the law erecting the inferior courts, and on the repeal of the law from whence the legal existence had been derived, constituting them judges, he should be glad to hear how they could be judges; that being created by the law, they derived their existence from the law, and could not as judges survive it; the Constitution means a judge known to the law, and not the man who had been a judge, after his political dissolution. He insisted that Congress can establish legislatively a court, and thereby create a judge; so they can legislatively abolish the court, and eventually annihilate the officer; that the inferior courts are creatures of the Legislature, and that the creature must always be in the power of the creator; that he who createth can destroy. But we are asked, by the honorable gentleman from New York, in answer to this, "has a man a right to destroy his own children?" Mr. W. said he had been taught to believe that man had not been his own creator, but the happy instrument of creation. But this power that is now denied to us, had been exercised by the gentlemen themselves, in the very law that is now intended to be repealed. You will see, by adverting to that law, the district courts of Tennessee and Kentucky are expressly abolished, and the office of a district judge for the States of Tennessee and Kentucky annihilated. But we are told by honorable gentlemen that there was a circuit court established, consisting of these two States and another State, and that the judges of the district courts were appointed judges of the circuit courts, and accepted their commissions as such, and therefore they say that they did not destroy the office of the district judges of Tennessee and Kentucky. He asked if each other State had not district courts; he asked if there had not been circuit courts established in all the States by that law, and if the district courts of the other States had not been continued; and can it be said that a district court composed of a single State, as in the case of Tennessee and Kentucky, is not abolished, and the office of a district judge destroyed, because in the same law a circuit court is established, and the district judges appointed circuit judges? Can it be said in fact that it is the same office, when the duties are extended to three States, to sit in three places, as it was when limited to one State and one place; or will gentlemen tell us that if the judges of the district courts had refused to act as judges of the circuit courts, whether they would have been still judges of the district courts after they had been abolished? Or will they say that the commission of a district judge limiting his jurisdiction to a State is the same as that of a circuit judge extending it over three States? And whether the law authorizing the commission over three States ought not to precede the commission vesting that authority?

Mr. W. asked if Congress, when exercising their authority in the first instance to establish inferior courts, had not the right to limit their continuance to any period, and that at the end of that period, if the law was not continued, what would be the situation of the judge appointed under the law, would his authority continue? Certainly not. And will any gentleman contend on this floor, that if a former Congress had a right to give limitation to the continuance of a law that the present Congress have not the same authority to limit or to discontinue? Honorable gentlemen, however ingenious, will find themselves, he presumed, unable to solve these difficulties, or to reconcile these inconsistencies; for his part, the authority by which this subject had been brought before them, the recommendation of the President, had been powerful. The letter and spirit of the Constitution, when recurred to, had established him in that opinion, that they were justified in the measure now proposed, and the practice of Congress in abolishing the district courts of Tennessee and Kentucky, satisfied him that it was no new idea—no new exercise of power; and further, that nothing in the form of a Constitution can be drawn so guardedly that gentlemen may not be found to differ on its true construction, and even, as in the present case, at different times and on different occasions, differ themselves in the construction of the same instrument. If all these considerations were not sufficient to satisfy gentlemen, and we were obliged to recur to the principles on which this instrument must have been established, we shall find that we do not in any degree violate them by the construction we put on them. If the British Government is recurred to, from whence the State Governments borrowed their principles, or if the State Constitutions are resorted to, we shall find thoroughly incorporated the principles for which we contend, that the judges are independent only of the Executive, but never above the law giving them their political existence. He admitted, with the gentleman from New York, that judges ought to be the guardians of the Constitution, so far as questions were constitutionally submitted to them; but he held the Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary, each severally the guardians of the Constitution, so far as they were called on in their several departments to act; and he had not supposed the judges were intended to decide questions not judicially submitted to them, or to lead the public mind in Legislative or Executive questions; and he confessed he had greater confidence in the security of his liberty in the trial by jury, which had in all times been considered as the palladium of liberty, than in the decision of judges who had at some time been corrupt. For his part, he did not wish to break down the judiciary or the judges, or to violate the Constitution, though he confessed he should feel as secure in the decision of the State judges in even federal questions, with an appeal to the Supreme Federal Court, as in the present judges; and indeed the Constitution, in the fourth article, second section, which imposes on all State judges the oath to observe the Constitution and laws of the United States, always seemed to him to consider the State courts in a certain degree judges of federal questions. Nor had he ever been able to raise a doubt in his own mind as to the propriety of trusting State judges to decide federal questions, with an appeal to a federal court, when he considered that State juries had always been trusted to decide all questions, from whose decision there was no appeal; and indeed the State courts at all times had been the only judicial guardians of our rights, whose integrity had never been impeached. The gentleman from New York is so careful of the Constitution, that he wished it secured by walls of brass. Does he apprehend others wish to violate it, and himself its exclusive guardian, and that other gentlemen do not hold themselves equally bound to protect it, or have nothing worth protecting? For his part he had sworn to support it, and never should intentionally violate it; but he believed that no human invention could make it more secure than it was, deposited in that hallowed temple, and locked by the key of our holy religion.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 6th instant, that the act of Congress passed on the 13th day of February, 1801, entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the Courts of the United States," ought to be repealed. And, on motion of Mr. DAYTON, Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

The letter laid before the Senate on the 8th instant, signed Thomas Tingey and others, the vestry of Washington parish, was considered.

Resolved, That the President of the Senate, for the time being, be requested to make such order respecting the said letter as he may think proper.

TUESDAY, January 19.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House insist on their disagreement to the fourth, sixth, and seventh, amendments of the Senate, to the bill concerning the library for the use of both Houses of Congress; they agree to the conference desired by the Senate on the subject-matter of the said amendments, and have appointed managers on their part.

JUDICIARY BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 6th instant, that the act of Congress passed on the 13th day of February, 1801, entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient nient organization of the Courts of the United States," ought to be repealed.

Mr. WHITE, of Delaware.—I shall be believed, sir, when I assure you, that nothing short of the highest sense of duty, and the great responsibility of the seat I have the honor to hold, could enable me to overcome the extreme embarrassment I feel in rising to present my sentiments to the Senate on this the most important question ever before them. I presume not to think, after the superior eloquence and talents that have been here displayed, it will be in my power to cast on the subject a single additional ray of light. Already, sir, has it been exhausted, and were I to consult my own feelings only; I should not now have to trespass upon your patience, whilst in the execution of a sacred duty, I pass hastily over part of the same ground that has before been trod by some of my honorable friends, making such additional remarks as might have escaped them. In the course of my observations, I shall confine myself to the same division of the question pursued by the honorable mover, and which it naturally presents.

1. As to the expediency. 2. As to the constitutionality of the measure proposed in the resolution.

That some system of courts is necessary in our country for the execution of laws and the administration of justice, gentlemen most hostile to the present establishment will readily admit. It is acknowledged, too, on the other side of the House, that the expenses of the present judiciary are unworthy of your consideration; that it is one of the least evils attending it; but, say gentlemen, it is upon too large a scale, it is useless, it is dangerous.

Sir, upon the original plan of the courts, it was found impossible that the six presiding judges traversing this extensive country, and holding their sessions in every State, could either do justice to the business, or at their advanced periods of life, withstand the fatigue of such severe and constant exercise; some alteration, some amendment of the system was found indispensable; the interest of the country demanded it of those in office, and it is for the execution of this duty that their political memories are now so illiberally reviled. It is well known, sir, that the United States are increasing in population, commerce, and wealth, beyond any former example; that new subjects of litigation are every day finding their way into your courts, and short-sighted indeed would have been the founders of the establishment now under consideration had they confined their views to the present time. Previous to the passing of this law, no man who could avoid it would commit his business to your courts, their arrangement amounted almost to a denial of justice; suitors preferred taking their chance in the State courts to the delay and expense attendant upon the proceedings in those of the United States. The constant change of presiding judges at every succeeding court, totally unacquainted with what had been done by their predecessors, and introducing new rules of practice, together with the unavoidable shortness of the terms, hung up the business to the great inconvenience and injury of many suitors, and must in a short time have rendered that system not only useless, but even a nuisance to the country; people could not be expected to apply for justice to a bench where time was not given to administer it.

These, sir, among many others, are some of the reasons why business had not been originated in your courts antecedent to the present law. These are the reasons, sir, why their dockets are now so low; and permit me say, that the extracts contained in this document, even supposing them correct, which happens to be far from the fact, prove nothing; they were taken at a time when the present courts had scarcely commenced their operations, immediately after the first circuit, when no gentleman will undertake to say, there had been any thing like an opportunity at a fair experiment of them. And now, sir, before the people of the country have even become acquainted with the system, and before any man, unless by the power of inspiration, can judge of its utility, it is in a moment to be dashed to pieces. Why, I ask, sir, this precipitance? Do gentlemen fear that if the measure is delayed until another session the experiment might render the system popular? And these hateful judges—for there is the rub, sir—these hateful judges will not be so safely got rid of. I hope gentlemen, at least for the present, will quiet their fears; they need not, I can assure them, apprehend any immediate danger from this mighty army of judicial veterans, so terrible in sound; they are now, I believe, sir, in Winter quarters, and even if continued in service another year, could not totally ruin and enslave the country; or, as has been indeed very feelingly expressed by the honorable gentleman from Georgia, on my right, (Mr. JACKSON,) lay our virtuous citizens in irons. The honorable gentleman from the same State, on my left, (Mr. BALDWIN,) has been pleased to tell us, that the same justice was not to be expected from the courts of the United States, as from those of the individual States, because the judges of the former cannot have a sufficient knowledge of the usages and customs of the country, and their jurors not being of the vicinage, can know nothing of the parties or their suits. I admired much, sir, the ingenuity and candor of that gentleman, but this was certainly among the least solid parts of his argument; unhappily the very reasons he adduced, proved directly the opposite of what he wished. Judges, sir, should be governed only by the law of the land; they carry it with them; they are its expositors, and are sworn to decide according to it; and have nothing to do with the usages and customs of the neighborhoods where they may happen to sit. And I have always understood that the greatest possible security for the impartiality of jurors is their being entire strangers to the contending parties, and totally ignorant of their causes, until empannelled to decide them; they then view nothing but the naked facts arising out of competent testimony, and are influenced only by law and justice. And such, sir, is the frailty of our nature, that the best man in society may be acting under the influence of politics, friendship, passion, or prejudice, when he supposes himself governed by the purest motives. Well aware though, as I am, sir, that nothing short of the Constitution itself, and I fear that not even that will be sufficient to preserve the independence of the judiciary from this bold onset, I shall now proceed to the second division of the question.

I admit, sir, that the law proposed in the resolution to be repealed, is capable of much amendment, and it has never been denied but that Congress had the power of altering it in any way, so as not to impair the independence of the judiciary, by touching the offices or salaries of the judges; this cannot be done, the words of the Constitution on the subject are as explicit and certain as language can be. By the first section of the third article it is declared, that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish." The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour." Does our language admit of words more positive than these, sir? Not a letter, nor even a comma, is wanting to complete the meaning we assign to them; and I ask gentlemen to point out any other words that the framers of this instrument could have used, that would have been less equivocal, or that could import with more certainty the construction we now contend for; it has not yet been done, and I defy them to do it; and if a different construction can be given to these words, this written Constitution is not worth a sous; it is to all useful purposes a mere carte-blanc upon which a Legislative majority may write what they please.

In a preceding part of this Constitution, power is given to Congress to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court; by the act to which the resolution on your table refers, they did so, and in pursuance of that act, the President of the United States issued commissions to certain gentlemen as judges, they accepted of those commissions, and at the moment of their becoming judges, the Constitution attached to their offices, and guaranteed to them, the same independence and permanency as judges of the Supreme Court, for it makes no distinction. "Judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour." On the acceptance of their commissions, a complete contract was formed between them and the Government; the Constitution told them that the tenure of their offices should be their own good behaviour; the law told them that, for their services, they should receive a certain sum annually; these were the terms, sir, that tempted them to leave their other pursuits in life, and carry into execution this contract; and it is a contract that no power on earth can dissolve but by first altering this Constitution in the manner it directs, or by violating it; and any law attempting its dissolution, operates retrospectively, is an ex post facto law, and in that respect, too, unconstitutional.

But, sir, in order to place beyond a question forever the entire independence of the judiciary, the Convention went still further, and in this same section, nay, in this same sentence, for they followed the thing closely up, they declared that these judges, viz., of the supreme and inferior courts "shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office." And under the words of this Constitution, we have just the same power to diminish their salaries whilst they continue in office, as we have to remove them from their offices and strip them of all salary; they hold their offices during good behaviour, and the full amount of their salaries whilst in office by the same strength and power of language; for can it be said, sir, that the words "shall not" are more prohibitory than the word "shall" is mandatory? Certainly not. These latter words apply especially to Congress; they must have been introduced for the express purpose of fixing and marking the bounds of Legislative authority towards the judiciary. And it would seem as if the wise framers of this instrument had feared not, sir, that Congress would ever presume themselves authorized absolutely to remove any judges from their offices without cause, as is contemplated in that resolution, for such an idea could never have entered their minds, after they had the moment before expressly declared, in so many words, that the judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, should hold their offices during good behaviour, but that the aspiring pride and ambition of Legislative power, in some unhappy moment of intemperance or party warmth, might attempt to impair the independence of the judiciary in another way, by assuming a discretionary power over the salaries of the judges, and thus, rendering them dependent upon Legislative pleasure for a precarious support, make them servile and corrupt.

Gentlemen acknowledge that the judges of the Supreme Court are out of their reach, (thank Heaven that they happen to think so, or they, too, would accompany their brethren;) but, say they, the judges of the inferior courts are creatures of our own, and we can do with them as we please. Let me admit, sir, for argument sake, the positive meaning of the Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding, that these words, "the judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour," are equivocal. What reasons can gentlemen have to believe, upon what possible grounds can they presume, that the makers of this Constitution did not intend to place the judges of the inferior courts upon the same independent footing as those of the superior courts? Do they not belong to the same great department of your Government; intended to be kept separate and distinct from the other two great departments? Is not their independence equally important to the faithful administration of justice? Certainly, sir, and if possible more so, for it is to them the people, in most instances, must first apply for justice, and a vast proportion of the most important business that passes through their hands, is never carried into the Supreme Court.

JANUARY, 1802.

Judiciary System.

SENATE.

As to the outcry that has been raised about sixteen hundred, or sixteen thousand, or sixteen millions of judges, if gentlemen please—calculating on the abuse of power by the constituted authorities in the use of it, the honorable gentleman from Connecticut has so fully and unanswerably replied to it, that I shall make no observations on the subject.

The gentleman from Georgia, on my right, has told us that the Constitution cannot be altered in any other way than by two-thirds of Congress agreeing to it, and then very emphatically asked, will two-thirds now agree? I hope not, sir; but because a sufficient number of us cannot agree upon altering it Constitutionally, will gentlemen force their way through it by violence, in order to get at these judges? The same honorable gentleman has been pleased to compare this system and these judges to a cotton machine; when done, if it should not work to suit the maker, he tears it all to pieces and makes a new one. Are we at liberty to infer from this, sir, that the present judges cannot be made to work to suit the present rulers, and that this system is to be demolished to displace them, in order to make a new one, and seat upon your benches of justice creatures more pliable? I hope not, sir; I am sure such cannot be the views of any honorable gentleman.

It has been day after day echoed and re-echoed from one side of the Chamber to the other, that this law was one of the last expiring acts of the former Administration; that the Legislature had no right to pass it, because they knew it would be repealed. What, sir, are we told that a majority of the last Congress had no right to pass a Constitutional law? This is novel doctrine, indeed; and were they to omit doing good because they had reason to believe their successors would do evil? I acknowledge, sir, that the establishment of this Judiciary system was one of the last acts of the former Administration, and it was the very best act; the destruction of it is likely to be one of the first acts of the present Administration, and I pray God that it may be the worst; but from such a beginning the end is indeed incalculable.

Sir, these judges may, by the strong arm of legislative power, be driven from their seats; not their own unimpeachable integrity, their virtue, and their learning, or even the sacred barriers of the Constitution itself may be sufficient to avert their fate; but remember, though advanced in years, many of them will live to see what the gentleman from Maryland has called the efflux of passion and reflux of reason—they will live to see the people of this country review with horror the present attempt; and, if till then they should happily preserve their peace and liberties, wonder how it has happened.

I will now, sir, in conclusion, notice, in a style that it deserves, the language of the gentleman from Virginia, in the discussion of this question, applied to the State of Delaware—language unworthy of this floor. He tortured an expression of my honorable friend from New York to furnish himself with an opportunity of travelling far out of the subject, in order to insult the honor of the State I belong to. After speaking of the suability of States, he observed that he should feel the same interest for any State, large or small, whether it were the little State of Delaware herself, or the still more insignificant Republic of St. Marino." The speech is not yet in print, but if I am wrong the gentleman will correct me. [Mr. MASON explained: he did not mean by what he said anything derogatory to the State of Delaware; on the contrary, he entertained a high respect for that State.] Mr. WHITE.—I hope, Mr. President, I may be further indulged; I did not at the moment distinctly hear what the gentleman said, but now must insist on knowing explicitly from him, not only what he meant, but whether he believes the word "insignificant," as used by him, could in any way apply to the State of Delaware? [Mr. MASON was about to explain further, when the VICE PRESIDENT rose from his seat and observed, that he was not in the Senate when the gentleman from Virginia spoke, but if he had used any such words as were charged to him, they were improper, and ought not to have been permitted. That no reflections on any State or gentleman should be suffered in the Senate, and he hoped the gentleman from Delaware would take no further notice of it.] Mr. WHITE.—As the gentleman is now pleased to deny his intention, in obedience to the Chair, I shall spare myself the trouble and his feelings the pain of a retort that very readily presents itself.

Mr. CHIPMAN, of Vermont.—Mr. President, after the length of time which has already been consumed, and the abilities which have been displayed in this debate, I can have but little hope of exhibiting anything new for the consideration of the Senate. Yet, momentous as I consider the decision to be made on the present question, involving consequences powerfully affecting the most important principles of the Constitution, I cannot persuade myself to give a merely silent vote on the occasion. In the observations which I intend to make, I shall endeavor, briefly, to examine some of the principal arguments only, which have been offered in favor of the resolution on your table.

The arguments in support of the resolution have been reduced under two general heads:

1. The expediency of repealing the law contemplated in the resolution, and
2. The Constitutional power of Congress to repeal that law.

To evince the expediency of the measure, it has been said that the system of 1793 was adequate to all the purposes of the National Judiciary; and that the judges appointed under that system were competent to all the Judicial duties required. Upon this, sir, I shall briefly observe, that from the number of terms of the supreme and circuit courts, and the immense distance to be travelled, the labor was unreasonably great. From the labors and fatigues of riding the circuit, there could not be allowed time sufficient for those studies, and for that calm and deliberate attention which is so necessary to a proper discharge of the duties of a judge.

At times, it has happened that a supreme judge could not attend a circuit court; from this circumstance, the court in the district to which I have the honor to belong, has more than once failed to be holden. At other times, the arrival of the judges has been so late that the proper business of the term could not be completed. These failures occasioned very great delay, expense, and vexation to the suitors; and we know that the same or greater failures and delays have unhappily been experienced in other parts of the United States—failures and delays which I cannot attribute to any criminal negligence of the judges, but to the burdensome duties imposed by that system, and the infirmities and accidents to which men must ever be exposed, in the performance of labors so arduous and extensive.

To prove that judges of the Supreme Court must have been competent to all the duties of that and the circuit courts, the honorable gentleman who brought forward the resolution drew a comparison from the courts and judges in England. He has told us that in England there are but twelve judges and three principal courts; that these courts embrace, in their original or appellate jurisdiction almost the whole circle of human concerns; that the two courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas, consisting each of four judges, entertain all the common law suits of forty shillings and upwards, arising among nine millions of the most commercial people in the world; and that they have, moreover, the revision of the proceedings of the subordinate courts in the Kingdom, down to the courts of pie-poudre; and that from long experience these courts have been found fully competent to all the business of the Kingdom. This statement, sir, is by no means correct. In England, the House of Lords is the supreme court of appeals in the last resort, in causes both in law and in equity. Instead of three, there are four superior courts. The court of Chancery, in which are decided all suits and matters in equity, including a very numerous and important class of causes. The courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, all of which have original jurisdiction in civil causes; and the King's Bench, besides being the highest court of criminal jurisdiction, has also the correction and revision of the proceedings of all the subordinate courts, by writ of error or otherwise. The subordinate courts, which were barely mentioned, are very numerous. There are in England, exclusive of Wales, more than forty counties, all of which have their separate courts and judges. Some of the counties are regular franchises. Lancaster, Chester, and Durham, have their separate courts, both of law and equity, which claim cognizance of causes and parties within their respective jurisdictions, even against the courts at Westminster. There are also an immense number of cities and towns corporate throughout the Kingdom; the courts and judges, of which, though more or less limited in their jurisdiction, entertain a vast variety of civil suits. There are, besides these, the high court of admiralty, which has an exclusive jurisdiction in maritime causes; the courts of the two universities, the prerogative court of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the archiepiscopal court of York, the diocesan and other ecclesiastical courts, having also an extensive jurisdiction, of a civil nature, in causes testamentary, and those relating to the distribution of the goods of intestates.

Wales is a principality, and its courts have exclusive original jurisdiction within the territory. The great sessions is the highest court of the principality from which a writ of error lies in the Court of King's Bench. The subordinate courts and judges are equally numerous, in proportion to the territory and inhabitants, with that of England. I omit the courts of conscience and other inferior courts, and magistrates almost without number. From this view, though imperfect, it is evident that the comparison attempted by the honorable gentleman, is by no means favorable to his conclusion. The population of that country exceeds in number that of the United States by one third, perhaps more; but its whole extent, inclusive of Wales, though not comprehended in the Nisi Prius circuits, does not equal one of the circuits of the United States, under the system of 1793; and yet that country employs, it is believed, more courts and judges, not only than the Government of the United States, but than all the individual States taken in addition. I do not however conceive that any advantage is to be derived from the comparison, to the one side or the other. The situation of property and civil policy, numerous and complicated rights, introduced by ancient usages, and supported by laws and habits, and by interests public and private, may render a greater number of courts and judges, a more extensive judicial system, necessary in one country than in another: I think it ought to be laid wholly out of the question.

It has been said, sir, that a knowledge of the local laws, of the customs and manners of the several States, is necessary to the judges of the Supreme Courts, and cannot be dispensed with on appeals in causes arising in different parts of the Union, and that the judges can acquire this knowledge in no way but by attending the circuit courts in the several States. But let me observe, sir, that the laws of the several States, which vary from the common law, are to be found in their statute books, in the decisions of their courts and their rules, of practice; for no custom can as such become a law, until it shall have been adopted by usages and established by judicial decisions. All these may be made to appear on an appeal, either on the face of the records in the pleadings, or in the special verdict, or by proper exemplification, and will afford the court in such case a more correct knowledge than the recollection of a judge, of what he has caught in the hurry and fatigue of the circuit.

A further objection has been urged against the continuance of the present judicial system, from the additional number of judges which it has introduced, which it is said may prove dangerous to the liberties of the country. An honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. JACKSON) cited the opinion of an author who has written on the British constitution, that the greatest political evil which could befall the country, was the existence of large judiciary bodies, and who had illustrated his ideas on that subject by instancing the Parliaments of France. This observation does not, neither was it meant by the author, to apply to any particular number of courts in due subordination, each consisting of a small and limited number of judges and employed solely in proper judicial business. But it applies with force to courts composed of numerous members and forming large bodies, who, in addition to their proper judicial functions, are permitted to assume an authority in the political concerns of the nation. Such were the Parliaments of France, the late judicial courts of that country; particularly the Parliament of Paris. The members of this body were very numerous, and as it was necessary that all royal edicts, before they were to be considered as laws, should be registered in that court, they claimed the right of deliberating and deciding on the registration of any edict offered by royal authority, and consequently of permitting or refusing it the sanction of a law. With this claim that body certainly became dangerous to the existing Government, and the contest which ensued between them and the King on this subject, had no doubt a powerful effect in precipitating the late revolution in that country. But there is nothing in all this which can be applied to the courts of the United States. Let me observe, sir, that there has always appeared to me, in the system of 1793, which is sought to be restored, a very great and manifest impropriety. The circuit courts were in that system, though subordinate, in some measure blended with the Supreme Court, one or more of the judges of the Supreme Court being always judges of the circuit courts. This rendered the Supreme Court a fluctuating body, some of the judges of the Supreme Court being always excluded in the decision of causes coming by appeal from the different parts of the United States. And when two supreme judges held the circuit courts of the four remaining judges, who were to decide on an appeal, three might reverse a judgment against the opinion of the fourth, and the opinion of the two judges in the circuit court, unless those judges, from whose judgment the appeal was made, gave also their opinions in favor of an affirmance, and which they might do, their exclusion being indeed only voluntary, from a high and just sense of propriety. This has always appeared to me, to say no more, a very glaring impropriety in that system. The circuit courts under that system have indeed been compared to the Nisi Prius courts in England, but the slightest attention will convince any one that they do not compare. The circuit courts in our system are courts of original and distinct jurisdiction; not so the courts of Nisi Prius in England; they are considered as a branch of the superior courts, at Westminster, and are held by a commission of assize usually issued to a judge of one of the superior courts, and an associate for each of the six circuits into which England is for that purpose divided. When a cause in any of the superior courts is by the pleadings put on an issue of fact, it is with the record sent to be tried at Nisi Prius by a jury of the proper county; instead of calling up a jury to try it at the bar in Westminster Hall. After the trial at Nisi Prius, the verdict with the record is remitted to the court, out of which it was sent, and there the opinion of the Nisi Prius judge and the conduct of the jury are examined, and considered as matters passing in the same court. Here then the comparison wholly fails: there is no similarity between the two systems, except that of a judge riding the circuit.

Here, sir, I shall waive any further observations on this part of the subject, and come to the great question which it is necessary to decide. Have Congress the Constitutional power to repeal the law as contemplated by the honorable mover of this resolution? To abolish the courts established by that law, put down the judges, and abolish their salaries? It is true, as was observed by the honorable gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. BALDWIN) that the resolution does not necessarily involve that question, because the repealing act, if the resolution should be adopted, may be so modified as to avoid any difficulty on the great point. But as the honorable mover avowed his intention to be an abolition of the courts, the offices of the judges and their salaries, and as the principal arguments have in the course of this debate been directed by that view of this subject, I shall be permitted to consider it on that ground.

One source of argument in favor of the measure proposed, has been derived from the powers considered as incident to every legislative body. It is said that a power to repeal all its legislative acts is inseparably incident to every sovereign Legislature—that the act, the repeal of which is contemplated, is a legislative act of Congress, therefore Congress necessarily have the power to repeal it—that to admit the contrary, is to say that the power of Congress at one time is not equal to its power at another time—that a subsequent may be bound by the acts of a former Congress, contrary to a very important maxim in legislation—in a word, that it is to make the creature greater than the creator, as it denies to Congress the power over its own acts, which it has passed, and will in course put a stop to all amendments, all improvements of our laws. This doctrine, here meant to be asserted, is not in the full extent applicable to the legislative powers under our Constitution. There are acts which Congress are by that instrument expressly denied the power of passing—there are acts which, whenever passed, Congress cannot repeal, or rather the effects of which they cannot even suspend, much less can they destroy. They are expressly denied the power of passing ex post facto laws; and this applies no less forcibly to a repealing act than to any other act—it is by its operation that the nature of the act is in this case determined. Every act which in its operation attempts to divest any right previously acquired, whether by a former act of legislation, or by any other lawful means of acquisition, is in name, nature, and essence, ex post facto.

Indeed, sir, I apprehend that some gentlemen have been led into a mistake on this subject, by an incautious admission of maxims and theories of legislative powers in another Government; but which do not apply to our Government, as instituted and limited by our Constitution. There are, sir, in every nation two kinds of legislative powers. The one is original and extraordinary; and may be called the power of political legislation. It is by an associating nation employed in forming and organizing the Government, in disposing its powers and defining or limiting their exercise. The other is derivative, the ordinary power of legislation, and is employed in the civil regulations of the community. In the first consists the political sovereignty of the nation. This power is transcendent. It is paramount to all other powers in the nation. It can create powers, rights, and duties, and can abolish them at pleasure; not because what it does, is always wise or even just; but because no other power in the nation can have a right, or can be equal to control its operations. In Great Britain, from ancient usage, the consent of the nation witnessed, by long and general acquiescence, both the ordinary and extraordinary powers of legislation are considered to be vested in the Parliament of the nation. Acting in this capacity of political sovereign of the nation, the British Parliament can create rights, and can destroy existing rights, at will; although in exercising such acts of power, they proceed with great caution, and are careful to indemnify individuals, whose rights they may have injured. In this capacity it can, as it has done, remodel the Government. It can fix and alter the duration of Parliaments, and change and limit the descent of the Crown. Indeed, vested with this power, in addition to the ordinary powers of legislation, the figure is hardly too bold, by which, when acting on subjects within the reach of its authority, it is said to be omnipotent. Not so the Congress of the United States; they possess not that transcendent power, that uncontrollable sovereignty of the nation; they possess the ordinary powers only of legislation; and these powers they derive under the Constitution of the United States: by this instrument their powers are instituted, limited and defined. This instrument is the act of the political sovereign, the People of the United States. To them it was proposed, and they, through their agents empowered for that purpose, enacted it the fundamental and supreme law of the National Government. They have said, as they had a right to say on this subject, Congress shall act; or that they may act at their discretion; here the Congressional power is limited, there is placed a barrier which shall not be passed. Congress, as I observed, possess not this paramount power; but in one mode, provided for altering and amending the Constitution, they are, under certain restrictions, permitted an inceptive power. They have a right to originate proposals of amendments, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the State Legislatures, to whom the national sovereignty is in this instance referred, are adopted into, and become a part of that instrument. In another mode, the State Legislatures have the power of inception; they also may originate proposals of amendments, which Congress must refer to a convention of the people for their ultimate acceptance and ratification. In this instance alone, have the people of this country reserved to themselves a portion of the national sovereignty, in the exercise of which is only found that voice of the people, which, because it is not to be resisted, is sometimes called the voice of God. This, sir, is the authority of that supreme law under which we act, the Constitution of the United States; an authority indispensably binding. We have no right, when we wish to carry a favorite measure, to which we find some barrier opposed by the Constitution, to prostrate or to overleap that barrier. We have no right to say that the national sovereign, could it now be consulted, would dispense with the limitation, would remove the barrier, which, in our present opinion, stands opposed to the public good. No, sir, we may not approach this ground. It is dangerous; it is an usurpation of the national sovereignty. We are but agents of the nation, acting under a limited authority. All our acts which exceed that authority are void.

These are the principles to be applied in the investigation of Constitutional powers. Let us then examine the Constitution upon these principles, and fairly determine whether we are permitted the power for which it has been contended, the Constitutional power to remove a judge, by abolishing the office, and consequently to deprive him of his salary? The first provision which we find in the Constitution relating to the judicial department, is in the second section, where, among other powers enumerated, it is declared that Congress shall have power "to establish tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court." Upon this it was observed, by the honorable gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Jackson,) that this being a grant to Congress of a legislative power to establish inferior courts, necessarily includes the incidental power to repeal; that this being a first grant, cannot be restrained nor taken away by any subsequent provision in the Constitution upon the same subject; that we are to take the rule of construction, that the first grant, and the first word of a grantor in a deed, shall prevail over a subsequent grant, or subsequent words of a different import. Are we, indeed, sir, to apply in the construction of the Constitution, the law, the supreme law of the nation, the rules devised for the construction of a deed, a grant, by which a few paltry acres are transferred from one individual to another? No, sir, very different are the rules of construction; the first act of the grantor, but the last act of the Legislature, shall prevail; or where, in any case, is the power to repeal? Another rule, more universally applicable, is, that you shall so construe a law that every part of it, if possible, may stand together, that every part may have its operation. Thus, if there be a general provision in the former part of a law, and there follow a particular provision, which cannot take effect unless some part of the former provision be set aside, the latter shall be considered as a limitation of the former, and which shall be carried into effect so far only as it is not incompatible with the latter.

In the third section of the Constitution is a further provision: "That the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme “Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and appoint.” The highest judicial authority shall not be divided into two courts. It shall, to use a ruder phrase, be one and indivisible. I consider it as imperative on Congress to establish, not only a Supreme Court, but also to establish some courts of inferior jurisdiction, which may be modified and extended from time to time, as experience and future expedience shall dictate, so that it be without violence to any part of the Constitution. The words, “as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and appoint,” were introduced with intent so far to give a discretion on the subject. The power of erecting courts, is here taken for granted, as is contained in the clause before cited, from the second section, supplied by the general clause, by which it is declared, that “Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into effect all the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any officer, or department of the Government.” I cannot understand it; for how is it possible so to understand it, that the words, “may ordain and appoint,” in their connexion imply also to abolish? Certainly it is not a necessary implication. That Congress are required to make a provision of inferior courts; that the thing is not merely optional, is very clear from another part of this section, declaring to what class the judicial authority of the United States shall be extended. [Read that part of the section.] Here observe, the Supreme Court has original jurisdiction in the smaller number only of the cases specified; so that without a provision for the greater number, and the judicial authority, instead of being extended to all the cases enumerated, would in fact be limited to a few only. Let us now examine the provision relating to the judges, which is contained in the former part of this section—a provision intended to secure to the judges a proper degree of independence. It is declared, that “the judges both of the Supreme Court and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour.” The judges of all the courts are placed on the same footing. The expression is not, that they shall continue in office, which might seem to be compulsory, but shall hold their offices, implying at their option, during good behaviour. For a judge may resign; he may accept a place incompatible with the office of judge, as he may, on election, accept the place of Senator or Representative in Congress, by which his office of judge would be vacated by his own act, implying a resignation. The force of the expression clearly is, that no judge, either of the supreme or inferior courts, so long as he continues to behave well, can be removed from the office, or the office removed from him by the act of any other. For the expression being general, with only one exception, in the nature of a proviso, that he continues to behave well, it is exclusive of every power either to remove the judge from the office, or, as has been ingeniously indeed suggested, of removing the office from the judge, causing it to vanish from its hold on any other ground or pretence whatever. It is a well-known rule, that the expression of an exception in any provision, excludes every other exception by implication. Next it follows, “and shall (the judges shall) at stated times receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.” How long shall they continue to receive, or be entitled to receive, an undiminished compensation or salary? So long as they shall continue to hold their respective offices. And how long are they entitled to hold their offices? So long as they shall continue to behave well. That is, the duration of the time for which they shall be entitled to receive an undiminished salary, shall be equal to the duration of the time for which they are entitled to hold their offices, equal to the duration of the time in which they shall continue to behave well. What rarely happens in subjects of this nature, the position that the judges cannot, during good behaviour, without a direct violation of the Constitution, be deprived of holding their offices, or of receiving their salaries, is capable of the highest proof, not merely by a train of probable and metaphysical reasoning, but by the clearest and plainest mathematical demonstration. It is a comparison of quantities in the duration of time; or shall it now for the first time be said, that when one quantity, or one length of duration is equal to a second, and the second to a third, that nevertheless they are not equal each to the other? Have intuitive truths at length changed their nature? Are they in these times inverted to falsehoods? Have the clearest axioms of ancient science suffered a revolutionary subversion? No, sir, they remain the same; they are still capable of assisting us to the same infallible conclusions.

The gentleman from Kentucky has told us, that if the construction against which he contended had been contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, it would have been explicitly declared, that the judges shall hold their offices and salaries during good behaviour; fairly admitting, that a declaration thus explicit, would have been conclusive for the construction of his opponent. Surely it will not be contended, that the idiom of the English language is so inflexible, and its interpretation so precise, that identical positions to be equally clear and explicit, can be expressed by identical words and phrases only. Had the expression been, they should hold their offices and receive their salaries during good behaviour, would not the meaning have been the same and equally expressive? Indeed the word hold, though well applied to an office, is not very properly applied to taking the payment of a salary. Or had it been, “they shall hold their office during good behaviour, and while they continue in office, which is to be during good behaviour, they shall continue to receive their salaries, which shall not during that time be diminished,” it certainly would have been a declaration equally explicit with that suggested by the gentleman. And this it has been clearly and demonstrably proved, is the same as that which is expressed in the Constitution.

I will here, sir, though it might perhaps have been more properly done before, make a few observations on the independence of the judiciary. It has been said by some gentlemen, in effect, that though the judges ought to be independent of the Executive—though they ought not to hold their offices or salaries dependent on the will of the President, yet, in a Government like ours, there can be no reason why they should not, like the other departments of the Government, be dependent on public opinion, and on Congress, as properly representing that opinion. That if the judges are made thus independent; if Congress cannot remove them by abolishing their offices, or in any other way, except that of impeachment for misbehaviour, they will become a dangerous body in the State; they may, by their discussions on the constitutionality of a law, obstruct the most important measures of Government for the public good.

Unfortunately for the argument, this doctrine agrees neither with the nature of our Government, which is not vested with the unlimited national sovereignty, but from that derives its powers, nor with the positive and solemn declaration of the Constitution. That Constitution is a system of powers, limitations, and checks. The Legislative power is there limited, with even more guarded caution than the Executive; because not capable of a check by impeachment, and because it was apprehended, that left unlimited and uncontrolled, it might be extended to dangerous encroachments on the remaining State powers. But to what purpose are the powers of Congress limited by that instrument? To what purpose is it declared to be the supreme law of the land, and as such, binding on the courts of the United States, and of the several States, if it may not be applied to the derivative laws to test their constitutionality? Shall it be only called in to enforce obedience to the laws of Congress, in opposition to the acts of the several States, and even to their rightful powers! Such cannot have been the intention. But, sir, it will be in vain long to expect from the judges, the firmness and integrity to oppose a Constitutional decision to a law, either of the national Legislature, or to a law of any of the powerful States, unless it should interfere with a law of Congress; if such a decision is to be made at the risk of office and salary, of public character, and the means of subsistence. And such will be the situation of your judges, if Congress can, by law, or in any other way, except by way of impeachment, deprive them of their offices and salaries on any pretence whatever. For it will be remembered, that the legislative powers of the several States, as well as those of Congress, are limited by the Constitution. For instance, they are prohibited, as well as Congress, to pass any bill of attainder or ex post facto law. The decisions of the judges upon such laws, and such decisions they have already been called upon to make, may raise against them, even in Congress, the influence of the most powerful States in the Union. In such a situation of the judges, the Constitutional limitation on the Legislative powers, can be but a dead letter. Better would it be they were even expunged.

Thus, sir, it appears, that the independence of the judges, even of Congress in their Legislative capacity, is agreeable to the nature of our Government, to the whole tenor as well as the express letter of the Constitution. But, sir, at this late stage of the debate I will not farther enlarge; I will only add, that upon these principles, and with these views of the subject, I shall give a hearty negative to the resolution on your table.

MR. WELLS, of Delaware.—I know not what apology I shall make for rising at this late period of the debate, unless I find it in the importance of the subject under discussion. Coming, as I do, from one of the smaller States, all of whom, from their peculiar situation, feel perhaps more than a common interest with their sister States in the preservation of this Constitution, I could not be indifferent to the progress of the present question. To a State circumstanced like that to which I have the honor to belong, the Constitution of the United States is the charter of her rights and the palladium of her liberties. I must, therefore, be forever induced by sentiments of attachment as well as duty to resist a measure calculated to subvert that Constitution. Such, I believe, is the tendency of the resolution on your table. When I say so, I do not mean to impute any unworthy motive to the gentleman who moved the resolution, or to those who have supported him. Assured I am, that those gentlemen regard this business in a very different light from what we do, or they would not have brought it forward. Believing that the law in question is a bad one, and may be constitutionally repealed, it was their duty to endeavor to effect its repeal.

Permit me now, sir, to glance in as cursory a manner as possible, that I may take up no more of your time than need be, at some of the reasons which have been assigned by the friends of this resolution. We have been told that the law proposed to be repealed, is unnecessarily expensive. That it is not calculated to promote the proper objects of a judiciary, and may be constitutionally repealed. That the old system, which this has superseded, was sufficient for the due administration of justice, and therefore it is expedient to revive it.

It is true, sir, that the retrenchment of expenses has been recommended to us by the President. It was his duty to do so. It is what the people had a right to expect from us as well as him. And these expectations, I trust, would not have been disappointed, even if our attention to it had not been invited by the Executive. We are placed now in a very different situation from what we have been for several years. The war in Europe is over. A war, permit me to say, more dreadful than any we read of. It has raged like a tremendous tempest, bearing down almost everything before it. It was not to have been expected that this our nation, towering like the majestic oak, should have escaped its fury, yet it has left us standing—the pride of the forest, and the only one to which it has not done some cruel mischief. But the storm is passed by; the danger is over, and many expensive establishments may now be reduced which could not before have been relaxed. It may now be economy to save, what it would have then been ruin not to have expended. But is the Judiciary of a nature to be reduced to what is called a peace establishment? From the manner in which gentlemen have talked of the expense of this department, it would seem that the sum to be saved by the measure now contemplated, was one hundred and thirty-seven thousand dollars, whereas the real amount is only about thirty thousand dollars. It is true, sir, this sum itself, were it even less, would be too much to squander away. But when you consider, that if you revive the former law, you must unavoidably increase the number of the judges of the Supreme Court, the difference of expense between the two systems will, probably, be about twelve or fifteen thousand dollars. And for this sum, amounting, among the people, to less than one third of a cent per man, will gentlemen persist in a measure calculated, in the opinion of almost half of the members of this body, to subvert your Constitution? Is this the economy which our constituents require from us? Do they wish us, like rash and greedy gamblers, to risk their all upon one single cast of the die? If the gentlemen are right, we save about twelve or fifteen thousand dollars. If they are mistaken in their opinions, we lose our Constitution. Is there any possible comparison between the advantage and the risk? But for argument sake be it admitted, that the danger on either hand is equal. Let us then examine the claims of each opinion to preference.

By the former law, which it is now proposed to repeal, there were six judges of the Supreme Court appointed in the United States. In each State was placed one district judge. For each State there was held a circuit court twice a year: this was composed of one or more of the judges of the Supreme Court and the district judge. The district judge in each State held a court of his own four times a year. The judges of the Supreme Court, besides holding these circuit courts, were twice a year to hold a Supreme Court at the seat of Government. One objection, in my mind, to the old system, was the duties of the inferior and superior judges being blended together and not sufficiently separated. Thus the judge of the district court was called to go up and associate himself with the judge of the Supreme Court; who was obliged to come down from the highest court to hold a circuit court. Your judges were like a Proteus; constantly changing their character. Each set of judges, in my opinion, ought to have their appropriate sphere, and should never be suffered to move out of it. Another objection is not without its weight. The same judges did not always attend the same circuit court; and, according to the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. BALDWIN,) this change is necessary, in order that the judges may in turn become, all of them, acquainted with the municipal laws and customs of the different States. What was the consequence? A judge, after attending a circuit court, and hearing a learned argument, was obliged sometimes to postpone his determination to the next term. When that arrived, a judge of the Supreme Court attended; but not being the same that attended before, a new argument became necessary. This, sir, may have been delightful sport for the gentlemen of the bar: the poor clients must have felt far differently. But the strongest objection to the system was the impossibility of the judges discharging the duty required of them. These six judges were to attend, among them, eight and thirty courts in one year. Considering the immense extent of country over which these courts were spread, and making due allowances for the many causes which would probably always prevent two or more of the judges from attending the circuits, each judge would have to attend twelve courts in a year. If this system is to prevail, you must select your judges as you enlist soldiers. Instead of inquiring for lawyers of integrity and talents, you must look out for able-bodied men; for such as are best fitted to stand the fatigue of constant travelling, and least liable to be affected by the inclemencies of weather. It is impossible, if gentlemen will reflect, that they can believe it expedient to revive a system so liable to objections, so impossible to be executed.

Let us now for a moment examine the law which is proposed to be repealed. It classes the United States into six circuits. In each of the States comprising a circuit, there is a circuit judge. In each circuit there is a court composed of the circuit judges, living within that circuit. The judges of the Supreme Court hold their sessions at the seat of Government twice a year. There is an appeal from the district court of each State, to the court of the circuit within which that State is classed. From the determination of the circuit court there is a final appeal to the Supreme Court. The same judges are not here, as under the former law, judges of the superior and inferior courts. Each has his proper station. No judge will here have to act upon an appeal from his own decision. In the one there is order and symmetry; in the other naught but confusion.

But it would seem in vain to reason upon the relative value of the two systems; for gentlemen think that they have discovered, by arithmetical calculations, that the late law was unnecessary. They endeavor to prove that the suits were decreasing in number at the time the additional judges were appointed. The document they rely upon for this purpose, is a return made from the clerks of the different circuit courts, showing the annual number of suits brought in each court since the year 1790. This return is not only inaccurate, but furnishes directly the reverse conclusions from those which have been drawn from it. I say it is inaccurate, because the return from the court of Maryland is entirely omitted, and the aggregates of the suits in the States of Tennessee and Kentucky are only given. It is incorrect in another respect. On the returns from the States of Massachusetts, and Virginia, it is stated that the suits depending are not included in those columns which show the number of suits annually instituted. This document, therefore, is too glaringly incorrect to be relied upon for establishing any conclusion which ought to guide us in business of this importance. But let us take it as we find it, and see if the calculations of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. BRECKENRIDGE) are more to be relied upon than the document itself. The gentleman says that in 1799 there were twelve hundred and seventy-seven suits instituted; and in 1800 there were six hundred and eighty-seven suits commenced; showing a decrease, "notwithstanding," as he says, "all the temporary and untoward sources of federal adjudication," of five hundred and ninety suits. There is one circumstance of importance to be noted in making this calculation. In the year 1799 there were four hundred and twenty-three suits brought in South Carolina, which is more than one half of the whole number of suits brought in that State for ten years together. The greater part of these suits were brought by Miller and Company, for the infringement of a patent right which they had obtained. The largest number of suits brought in that State, in any one year preceding the year 1799, was one hundred and four. The gentleman from Kentucky includes these suits in that year's account - - - - - 423

He includes all the criminal suits brought in those States from which the returns are made, amounting to 132, and all other suits, amounting to 722 - - - - - 854

Making, for suits brought in the year 1799, the number of - - - - - 1277

Then he allows for suits of 1800, only 687

He omits the whole of the criminal suits of that year, which amounted to 102, and of other suits 100; making together, thus omitted, - - - - - 202

Making together - - - - - 889

Leaving a decrease of suits, instead of 590, only - - - - - 388

It will be observed, as before mentioned, that there are included in the account of suits brought in the year 1799, 423 suits brought that year in the State of South Carolina.

These exceed by 319 the highest number of suits brought in any preceding year in that State. It will therefore be necessary to deduct these out of the above number, in taking a fair view of this subject - 319

The real decrease between the years 1799 and 1800 will only be - - - - - 69

But, in order to place this business in a still clearer point of view, I beg leave to submit a calculation showing the annual aggregate number of suits from 1790 to 1800, from which I have excluded the whole of the suits brought in South Carolina since the first establishment of the courts, viz:

In 1790, one hundred and eleven; in 1791, three hundred and six; in 1792, three hundred and eleven; in 1793, four hundred; in 1794, three hundred and sixty-five; in 1795, five hundred and twenty-seven; in 1796, four hundred and sixty-six; in 1797, nine hundred and twenty-four; in 1798, six hundred and fourteen; in 1799, eight hundred and fifty-four; in 1800, seven hundred and eighty-one.

The following calculation is made in order to show the number of suits brought, including those of South Carolina, from 1790 to 1800, viz:

In 1790, one hundred and eleven; in 1791, three hundred and thirteen; in 1792, three hundred and thirty-three; in 1793, four hundred and forty-six; in 1794, three hundred and eighty-five; in 1795, six hundred and fourteen; in 1796, four hundred and ninety; in 1797, nine hundred and seventy-seven; in 1798, seven hundred and nineteen; in 1799, twelve hundred and seventy-seven; in 1800, eight hundred and eighty-nine.

Thus, although it is apparent that there has been a gradual increase of suits, since the first establishment of the judiciary, yet the gentleman from Kentucky has endeavored to impress an opinion, that the suits have decreased in the proportion that six hundred and eighty-seven bears to twelve hundred and seventy-seven; and this, to use the gentleman's language, "notwithstanding all the temporary and untoward sources of federal adjudications." Yet he has taken special care, in order to swell up the suits of the year 1799, to draw from "these temporary and untoward sources of federal adjudications," all the criminal suits of that year, and to include the three hundred and nineteen suits of Miller and Company; but observe, when he comes to put down the suits of 1800, to contrast them with the number brought in 1799, these "untoward sources" are immediately dried up; for he excludes from his account all the criminal suits of that year, and one hundred other suits. Pray, sir, what kind of arithmetic is this? Is this the federal arithmetic which gentlemen have talked so much about?

Permit me now, sir, to say but a word or two upon the unconstitutionality of this measure. The Constitution has declared that the judicial power shall be vested in a supreme court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, create. It has added, that the judges of both the inferior and superior courts shall hold their offices doing good behaviour; but may be removed on impeachment, by the House of Representatives and conviction by two-thirds of the Senate.

What words can go stronger to the exclusion of every dependence of that department upon the pleasure of any other? The people have thus duly secured the two great objects they had in view, the independence of the judges, and their responsibility. This, however, is a new way of getting at the judge without affecting his independence. We will not touch the judge, but we will slip the office from under him. We will not lower his salary while he is in office, but we will so contrive it that he shall be divested of his office and salary at the same time. Thus, a mere majority of each House, with the concurrence of the President, shall effect, without any fault in the judge, what the people designed should be brought about only by impeachment. But we are asked, "suppose Congress should appoint an army of judges?" I will suppose no such thing. There is every security the nature of the case will admit of, that they will not do it. I will suppose the abuse of no power which is delegated by the Constitution, except what is supposed and guarded against by that Constitution. If gentlemen will suppose the abuse of power in creating unnecessary offices, it is equally fair to suppose the abuse of the power they contend for, viz: that of destroying the courts. I may suppose that it will be done to get rid of judges, however salutary the system under which they may be appointed.

I trust, therefore, sir, that this resolution will not prevail, since it manifestly appears that the system which gentlemen propose to destroy, is in itself preferable to that which they intend to revive; and that the expense between the two is inconsiderable. But how much more ought this measure to fail, when, without any possible benefit from the change, it is to destroy the independence of the judges, and prepare the way for the subversion of our Constitution!

Mr. WRIGHT observed, by the constitution of Maryland the judges of the Supreme Courts hold their commissions during good behaviour; the justices of the peace, who hold their county courts, were subject to an annual appointment, but it being found impracticable to procure law characters to act as justices of the peace, and that none other were qualified to decide questions of law, it became necessary to change the system, and, in 1793, a law was passed dividing the State into five districts, with a law character at the head of each district to ride the circuit, who, with two associates for each county, composed the county courts instead of the justices under the old system. These new judges were appointed by the law during good behaviour; but this law being like all new laws, a measure of experiment, was limited to a short duration, and has been from time to time continued. At the last session many important amendments being contemplated, the law was repealed, and a new law passed embracing the proposed amendments.

I have heard of but two judges being appointed under the new law; both of them were judges under the old law, and both were Federalists.—Mr. Ridgely, formerly a Republican, latterly a Federalist; Mr. Tilghman, always a Federalist, who, although he supported his own opinions with firmness, always treated the opinions of others with respect and politeness, whose amiable private character and judicial integrity had been so generally satisfactory, that not a member of either branch of the Legislature intimated his removal. From this view it must appear, that our Government, which is truly Republican, was not impelled by the unworthy motives that have been ascribed to her, and that Federalists of merit where they can be found are treated there with respect. Now, let me call your attention to a case in Maryland, when the Government was Federal, and in doing that, if I should in any respect misstate it, I hope my colleague, who, I believe, at that time was a member of the State Senate, will correct me. In 1791, it was found necessary to establish a criminal court for Baltimore town, and a law passed authorizing the appointment of a judge with a salary, and four associates, (whose commissions were during good behaviour,) to hold that court. This law was also limited to a short period; Mr. Chase, then judge of the general court, then a Republican, was appointed the judge of the criminal court. At the next session of the Legislature, there was an attempt to impeach him on the ground that the offices were constitutionally incompatible; this, however, failed; the Legislature, then, to get rid of Mr. Chase, repealed the law, and renewed it "totidem verbis." The Executive, however, renewed Mr. Chase's commission; but, at the next session, so fixed were the Federalists on their purpose, that they repealed that section of the law that related to the judges, and amended it, that "the district judge should be the judge of the criminal court," and thus dismissed Mr. Chase, the obnoxious judge. But, during all this business, in neither case was the Constitutional right to repeal these laws ever questioned, although the judges' commissions were during good behaviour; which must show the Legislative opinion, that a commission during good behaviour could not be beyond the law that created it, and must furnish strong evidence to the point before us, at two different periods in the politics of Maryland, that will suit each side of the House, and form a contrast in which I think the Republicans will not suffer.

Mr. COLHOUN, of South Carolina.—Much time, Mr. President, has been spent in the important debate on the resolution before you; great ingenuity, great abilities, and much eloquence, have been displayed on the occasion, by gentlemen on both sides of the question, and the subject presented in almost every possible point of view. For me, therefore, at this late stage of the debate, to rise, for the first time, in this House, on a subject of such magnitude and intricacy, already so ably discussed, and expect to throw much light on the subject, or find much new ground to tread on, would be presumptuous. But, thinking as I do, that the present question, both in principle and in its consequences, is of the highest importance to the Union; under this impression, under this conviction, I should be unfaithful to my own feelings, were I to give a silent vote on the occasion. If I can, therefore, throw but the weight of a feather in the scale that I think ought to preponderate, I shall think myself justified in doing so. But, sir, the subject has been so much exhausted, as well as the patience of the House, that I shall endeavor to be as concise as possible, and draw into as narrow a circle as so extensive a subject will admit, the leading features of the case, which, I apprehend, should have most weight in deciding the question.

First, then, I shall endeavor to show, that the present resolution, in its effect, is repugnant to the express letter and spirit of the Constitution. And, secondly, I shall contrast the obvious and natural consequences that will arise from agreeing to the resolution, with those that would follow should we disagree.

On the first point, the most important, as well as the most proper question, is, have we power, under the federal Constitution, to repeal the late act of Congress, so far as it respects the office and salary of the judges appointed under that act? If, by the letter and express words of the Constitution, we have not the power, then farther reasoning on the subject would be unnecessary, and arguments drawn from expediency or in expediency would be useless and irrelevant to the question.

I am not, sir, disposed to advocate the late Judiciary system in all its modifications, as I think it imperfect, and not adequate to the purposes intended, and that it is not such an arrangement of the Judiciary as ought to have been adopted. But, as it has got into existence, and is in operation, and the judges appointed under the act, commissioned agreeably to the Constitution, during good behaviour, the ground is now changed; and although, previous to the adoption of the act, opposition to the in expediency of the measure would have been right, would have been proper; yet now, under existing circumstances, as the law has passed, and the Constitution has attached to the office of the judges appointed under it, durability of office, co-extensive with good behaviour, to amend would be proper, but to repeal the act, at least so far as it respects the judges, would be unconstitutional; for I am of opinion, that as soon as their appointments were completed, and their commissions during good behaviour received, that then their offices as judges were completely beyond the reach of Legislative power; and that therefore the present resolution, in its operations, so far as it respects the office of the judges, is unconstitutional, and ought not to be agreed to.

Permit me here, sir, to define the legal rule of explaining a deed, a law, or Constitutional point, and then to apply the part of the Constitution in question to that rule. The rule of law is to make such an exposition of the section or clause under consideration, as will comport with its plain meaning when the words are taken in their common and usual acceptation, agreeably to the English language. If the clause is composed of dubious and uncertain expressions, that will admit of different meanings, or if several parts of the instrument seem to contradict, or be repugnant to each other, then the rule is, to make such a construction, if possible, as will be consistent with reason, and agreeable to the intention and purview of the whole instrument taken together. I think I am correct on the rule of law. Let us now examine the parts of the Constitution connected with the present subject, and apply to them the rules of law. Amongst the detailed powers of the Legislature, under the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, we find the following, to wit: "to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court."

If this was the only clause giving them power to establish the inferior courts, I would readily grant that the Legislature could make the law, and at pleasure repeal it, and that the judges, as to the tenure of their office under the act, would be at the will of the Legislature, the existence of the law determining the office of the judge, precisely in the same manner and on the same footing as of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Navy. But the subject is more fully expressed and explained under the proper head, in the first section of the third article of the Constitution, where it says: "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour; and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

Here the intention of the Constitution is explicit, and cannot be doubted; plainer words and a more clear constructed sentence cannot be penned. "The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour." We all fully and at once understand what is good behaviour in a judge, the oath he takes and the very nature of his office show it; to act with justice, integrity, ability and honor, and to administer justice speedily and impartially, is good behaviour; if he acts contrary, it would be misbehaviour, and the Constitution in that case has given a remedy by impeachment. If the clause, therefore, admits a certain, clear, and consistent construction, and no other part of the Constitution contains any article contradictory to it, which I contend is the case, the construction given by the gentlemen on the other side, being by implication only, and that against the plain and express words of the clause, will not be warranted by the principles of law; for if the Constitution is paramount to an act of the Legislature, then to hold an office during good behaviour, and during the pleasure of the Legislature, are synonymous terms; it must be so, or the act would be repugnant to the Constitution. The Constitution, on the face of it, appears to have been drawn with precision and correctness, nothing superfluous, nothing deficient. Had the Convention intended the construction now insisted for by the favorers of the resolution, to wit: that the judges of the inferior courts held their offices, not during good behaviour, but at the will of the Legislature, an explanatory clause after the words "good behaviour," would have been necessary and should have been inserted, to this effect: "Provided always, that the judges of such inferior courts shall hold their offices only during the existence of the law under which they may be appointed." By the clearness with which every part of the Constitution has been penned, it is right, it is fair, by analogy of reasoning, to say, that as no such provision is inserted, no such supposed construction was intended, and that therefore the plain letter and spirit of the Constitution must prevail. But, if possible, to make the matter more clear and conclusive, I beg indulgence, whilst I state three collateral arguments which greatly strengthen and enforce the construction which I advocate of that part of the Constitution. The first is, that all enlightened statesmen, at least since the American Revolution, with concurrent testimony, agree, that the Judiciary ought to be kept separate from, and independent of the Legislative and Executive powers; that without this check and control, there could be no true and rational liberty. Secondly, that the framers of the Constitution, who were themselves amongst the best informed and most distinguished citizens of the Union, intended to keep them distinct and separate, as the three great divisions and supporting pillars of the Constitution; this appears from the distinct position they assigned each on the face of that instrument. And thirdly, by the latter part of the first section of the third article, the Legislature have no power to lessen a judge's salary, even to the amount of one cent. This restriction must refer to the Legislature, as they alone have control over the funds of the Government; for the rule of law is, "that is certain, which can be rendered certain." If, therefore, this clause restrains the Legislature from even diminishing the salary of the judge, a fortiori, it prevents the removal from the office itself, as the words composing the whole clause are equally plain and expressive. Thus it appears, at least to me, by the plain and obvious construction of the words of the Constitution, confirmed and explained by the makers of it, that all the judges have a right to hold their offices during good behaviour, and that the Legislature, as a creature of that Constitution, cannot by any Legislative act, remove them. The gentlemen who advocate the resolution, in support of the measure, say, that Virginia, Maryland, and the last Congress, afford examples of the Legislature abolishing courts, and removing from office judges who, under a Constitution, held their appointments as in the present case, during good behaviour. Let us examine the facts, and see if they apply. Virginia had a general court, with common law jurisdiction, which extended throughout the State, a court of chancery, with equitable jurisdiction, equally extensive, and a court of admiralty; the judges of these three courts constituted the court of appeals. About the year 1787, the Legislature of that State found it necessary to establish circuit courts, and in the law enacted, that "the judges of the court of appeals should be the circuit court judges." This law the judges refused to execute as unconstitutional, and said, "they considered themselves as forming one of the three pillars on which the great fabric of government was erected, and that, when this pillar was endangered, a resignation would subject them to the reproach of deserting their stations, and betraying the sacred interests of society, entrusted with them; that the propriety and necessity of the independence of the judges, is evident in reason and the nature of their office, and that this applies more forcibly to exclude a dependence on the Legislature, a branch of whom, in case of impeachment, is itself a party." This was the opinion formed on the law by the then judges, who were some of the ablest lawyers, and greatest statesmen in the Union. I believe the event was, they protested against the law as unconstitutional, resigned their offices, had the resignation recorded, and afterwards were appointed circuit judges. If this statement is correct, which I presume in substance it is, can it be said, that it affords an example that would justify, or in the smallest degree support the principles of the resolution? In the case of Maryland, I have not had full information, therefore cannot decide. In the case of Tennessee and Kentucky, the district courts were abolished; the judges were not removed from office; but by law continued as circuit court judges, with additional duties and additional salary of five hundred dollars each. They neither vacated their office, nor had to take a new oath or new commissions; therefore, in this case, there was no violation of the Constitution. But, to sum the business up, the case of Virginia is against them; the case of Kentucky and Tennessee, not in point; and Maryland, should it afford an example, is the only and solitary one. But, let us now suppose for argument sake, though the fact is otherwise, that half of the States in the Union passed such laws; if those laws are founded on wrong and unconstitutional ground, should they be a precedent for us? Surely not. If they were founded in error, we ought to correct and not continue the error.

Some gentlemen have said, although we cannot remove the judge from the office, yet we can remove the office from the judge. To me this is a paradox in legislation. Do we mean to act indirectly, what we would not profess to do openly and directly? Are the gentlemen prepared to meet this question in all its consequences? Let me suppose they are, and sketch a law founded on the consequences of their repealing act, and exhibit the case in its real and true light. In framing a law the preamble should state facts, and explain the reasons for passing the act. Suppose, then, we should introduce, instead of their present repealing law, the following, viz: Whereas A, B, C, &c., the sixteen Federal judges appointed under the late act of Congress, although they have been commissioned during good behaviour, and have discharged the duties of the office with integrity, ability, and honor, yet we, the Legislature, in Congress assembled, finding their number to be more than we judge necessary for the administration of justice to the good people of the United States, and deeming the law under which they act not the best possible system that could be adopted, and thinking, also, that the public good requires that the judges of the inferior courts should not hold their offices during good behaviour, but should hold them at the will of the Legislature: Be it therefore enacted, &c., That the said sixteen Federal judges shall be, and they hereby are, removed and discharged from their respective offices as judges, and shall not be entitled to any compensation or salary after the passing of this act. This act and preamble would be in truth only what the repealing act in its effects intended, and will naturally produce.

Are we prepared to vote for a law in this form, with all the true reasons stated on the face of the act, and to wish that publicity should be given to it among our constituents, as an act that completely destroys the independence of their judges?

For the removal of the judges, I may venture to assert, is the great object of the repeal; and in this consists the injury from the Legislature assuming a power, without giving any reason in the act, as in the present case, "to repeal at pleasure any law establishing an inferior court," and by that means dismissing the judges from office. Party spirit, caprice, or personal dislike, would be sufficient cause of removal from office; the judges would know this, and perhaps some of them soon feel it. Let us suppose, and it is even supposable, that a cause came on before one of the dependent judges, between an influential member of Congress and a poor and obscure citizen; would any person say that the parties stood on equal ground, and that the scales of justice hung equal between them?

It would be almost beyond human nature for this dependent judge to be impartial, especially if his salary was the only means of subsistence; and men of great abilities, and well fitted for the office, might be in that situation, for a wise man tells us, that "the race is not always to the swift, nor riches to men of understanding." So fully am I convinced that the judges ought to be independent of the Legislature as well as of the Executive, that if there could be a doubt that they are not fully and completely so, the Constitution ought to be amended for that express purpose. Hitherto, the judges have supposed themselves to be independent, and the people have acquiesced under that belief, and ought and do wish their judges to be independent. One or two observations will prove their opinion on this point. All the States in the Union have, in their several constitutions, made their judges independent. The people at large, in every State, having sent members to their respective conventions, those conventions having fixed the conditional durability of offices in their judges, and the people uniformly acquiescing under their system, afford sufficient evidence of the public sentiment. Besides, in the case of Mr. Chief Justice Jay, when appointed Envoy Extraordinary to the Court of Great Britain, was not opposition to the appointment echoed from one end of the Continent to the other? That the example was dangerous, it put the judges under the influence of the Executive; that, although the prospect of an honorary appointment within the gift of the President was remote, yet it might influence and lessen their independence. If, then, the people were so alive and quick in feeling, when the causes of alarm were so remote and contingent, what will, what must, be their opinion, when they find out that the judges, from being independent, by holding their offices during good behaviour, are reduced to the servile situation of holding the office at the will, at the caprice of a Legislature? Is the public mind prepared for a shock of this kind? Shall the Legislature with a strong arm, and by an assumed power, destroy their independence, and thereby their existence as one of the pillars of the Constitution? In this situation of your Judiciary, will the streams of justice flow equally to the habitation of the rich and cottage of the poor?

No man who knows human nature will answer in the affirmative.

Let us now for a moment examine the consequences of giving a negative to the present resolution. If the resolution is not agreed to, what are the dreadful and fatal consequences that would follow? I answer, the worst that can possibly happen is, the annual payment of about thirty thousand dollars, the salaries of all your circuit court judges, who do the whole business of these circuits throughout all parts of the Union. Their number will neither impede justice, nor injure the principle or execution of it. It is not in controversy, the right of the Legislature to arrange and modify all the courts of justice, so as to make them best answer the distribution of justice with convenience to the citizens; the whole Judiciary can be systematized and put on the best and most respectable footing, without violating your Constitution. If the circuit court judges are too numerous, say in your revising law, when vacancies happen, that such vacancies shall not be filled up until the whole are removed, or as many of them as it may be necessary to remove. Thus the evil would be continually remedying itself, and at no very remote period would be totally removed, and that without any interference with the Constitution.

On the other hand, should the resolution be carried, what are the evils that would result? Your judges in that case would hold their offices at the will of the Legislature, and be their mere creatures, subservient to all their whims, caprice, and party spirit; would cease to be a check or barrier between them and the people, in cases of unconstitutional acts and abuse of power. It would also produce, agreeable to the course of human nature, a servile disposition, which by degrees would enervate the mind, and completely, in process of time, destroy that manly independence and firmness, so essential to an upright and good judge.

If, then, the evils, as I have stated, would be greater from adopting the resolution, than those that would result from passing a negative on it; and we add to that balance, at least the doubt of its being against the Constitution—and that this doubt is well founded is evident from the nearly equally divided opinions of the members within the walls of the Senate, and by the sentiments of thousands throughout the United States, of the ablest statesmen and best citizens—let us, then, on this, at least precarious and doubtful ground, tread light and step with caution; for to destroy the independence of the judges, is wounding the Constitution in a vital part—it is removing one of the main pillars that support it. If we begin to infringe the Constitution in one instance, we may in another, and, by slow and imperceptible degrees, alter all the great and leading principles of it, until at last the substance would be gone, and the shadow only remain: for, like a body of water, if one drop makes its passage, the whole stream will soon follow.

Mr. C. then went at some length into a full statement of the duties and jurisdictions of the supreme, circuit, and district courts; showed where he thought them defective, and pointed out the practical amendments necessary to make a complete and uniform Judiciary; he urged that such amendments would produce a system much preferable to either the present or former, and would render the present motion for a repeal unnecessary. This statement he gave preparatory to his motion, which was as follows:

“Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire if any, and what, alterations are necessary in the Federal Judiciary system.”

This was rejected by the VICE PRESIDENT as being out of order; which gave rise to a verbal amendment, that the word “repealed,” in the original motion be struck out, and the words “revised” and “amended,” be inserted, moved by Mr. DAYTON, to the original resolution, on which the yeas and nays were taken, and it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chipman, Colhoun, Dayton, Dwight Foster, Hillhouse, Howard, J. Mason, Morris, Olcott, Sheafe, Tracy, Wells, and White—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, and Wright—15.

The main question was carried by a similar division, and Messrs. ANDERSON, BALDWIN, and BRECKENRIDGE, were appointed a committee to bring in a bill.

WEDNESDAY, January 20.

The Senate assembled, but, there being no quorum, adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 21.

The credentials of SAMUEL WHITE, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Delaware, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of their late Senator, Henry Latimer, were presented and read, and the oath prescribed by law was administered to him by the VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee to whom was referred the bill authorizing the discharge of Laurence Erb from his confinement, reported an amendment; which was read.

Ordered, That it lie for consideration.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee of conference upon the differing votes of the two Houses, on the amendments to the bill concerning the library for the use of both Houses of Congress, made a report, and the report was adopted: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Senate do adhere to their fourth and sixth amendments, and recede from their seventh amendment, to the said bill.

FRIDAY, January 22.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they recede from their disagreement to the fourth and sixth amendments to the bill concerning the library for the use of both Houses of Congress. They have passed a bill fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States, and a bill for the protection of the commerce and seamen of the United States in the Mediterranean and adjoining seas; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill first mentioned in the message was read, and, by unanimous consent, was read a second time, and referred to Messrs. JACKSON, DAYTON, and HOWARD, to consider and report thereon.

The bill last mentioned in the message was read the first, and, by unanimous consent, a second time, and referred to Messrs. BALDWIN, SHEAFE, and MORRIS, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 19th instant, the resolution for the repeal of an act of Congress, passed on the 13th day of February, 1801, reported a bill to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes; which bill was read, and ordered to the second reading.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment, reported by the committee, to the bill authorizing the discharge of Laurence Erb from his confinement, and the report was adopted, and the bill being further amended; on motion to expunge the last proviso, to wit:

“That the said judgment shall remain in full force against any estate, real or personal, which the said Laurence Erb may hereafter acquire, and that process may at any time be thereupon issued against the same.”

It passed in the negative—yeas 4, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Jackson, Morris, Wells, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Chipman, Cocke, Dayton, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Hillhouse, Howard, Logan, S. T. Mason, J. Mason, Nicholas, Olcott, Sheafe, Stone, Sumter, and White.

On motion, that this bill pass to the third reading as amended: it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 4, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Chipman, Cocke, Dayton, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, S. T. Mason, J. Mason, Nicholas, Olcott, Sheafe, Stone, Sumter, Wells, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. T. Foster, Hillhouse, Howard, and Morris.

JAMES ROSS, from the State of Pennsylvania, attended.

The bill, entitled “An act authorizing the discharge of Laurence Erb from his confinement,” was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROSS presented the memorial of the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, signed Thomas Fitzsimons, President, stating the decayed situation of the piers erected in the river Delaware, for the protection of vessels in the Winter season, and praying Congress to make such appropriations, and take such other order thereon, as the necessity of the case requires; and the petition was read.

Ordered, That it lie for consideration.

The bill to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes, was read a second time; and, it was agreed that the consideration of this bill should be the order of the day for to-morrow.

TUESDAY, January 26.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee to whom was referred the bill for the protection of the commerce and seamen of the United States in the Mediterranean and adjoining seas, reported amendments; which were read.

Ordered, That they lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes; and, having agreed to sundry amendments,

On motion of Mr. DAYTON,

"That the bill be referred to a select committee, with instructions to consider and report the alterations which may be proper in the Judiciary system of the United States, and the provision to be made respecting the judges of the circuit courts, established by the act of the 13th of February, 1801, in case the said act shall be repealed:"

It passed in the negative—yeas 14, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chipman, Dayton, Dwight Foster, Hillhouse, Howard, J. Mason, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, Ross, Sheafe, Tracy, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Colhoun, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

On the question to agree to the reading of this bill as amended, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 15, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Chipman, Colhoun, Dayton, Dwight Foster, Hillhouse, Howard, J. Mason, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, Ross, Sheafe, Tracy, Wells, and White.

The VICE PRESIDENT determined the question in the affirmative.

So it was Resolved, That this bill pass to the third reading as amended.

WEDNESDAY, January 27.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill to repeal, in part, the act, entitled "An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read, and ordered to the second reading.

Mr. MORRIS presented the petition of White, Brothers & Co., and others, in behalf of the hat manufacturers of the city of New York, praying additional duties on the importation of foreign hats, and the repeal of the duties on wool and hat trimmings; and the petition was read.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 15th instant, the bill authorizing the discharge of John Hobby from his confinement, reported the bill without amendment.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments reported by the committee to the bill for the protection of the commerce and seamen of the United States in the Mediterranean and adjoining seas, which were adopted; and, on motion to strike out the third and fourth sections of the bill, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee on the bill authorizing the discharge of John Hobby from his confinement; and, on the question to agree to the third reading of this bill, it passed in the negative. So the bill was lost.

On motion, that it be

Resolved, That — be, and they are hereby, appointed a committee to inquire whether any, and, if any, what regulations are proper to be adopted respecting public officers and agents who shall squander public money officially entrusted to them, with leave to report by bill, bills, or otherwise:

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The bill to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes, was read the third time, and the blanks were filled, when

Mr. DAYTON said, that although he had been defeated in two attempts to arrest the progress, or turn the course of this business, he was not, however, so far discouraged as to be deterred from making one other. It would, he said, be recollected, that all which had been asked by him and by the opposers of this measure, in the first instance, was to attempt some modification of the law proposed to be repealed; but this was refused them. It was then proposed that both parties should unite their labors with a view to revise and amend the whole Judiciary system, but this also was denied them. Yesterday he had offered an amendment combining both objects; but it was negatived. He was encouraged, however, to renew it, with a little variation, even in this late stage of the bill, because he had learned that it had not been perfectly heard and understood by one of the gentlemen who had voted against it. He took leave to remind honorable members, that these conciliatory motions had been rejected by a majority of one, or at most two only, and that of course the Senate were almost equally divided.

Mr. D. concluded by saying, that it could not come to good, if measures, admitted by some to be bold and violent, and believed by many others to be unconstitutional, should be carried by a bare majority, and he trusted, therefore, that this proposition would now succeed. He then moved

Mr. COLHOUN begged to be indulged with the expression of a few ideas, which he considered the more important as the bill was likely to be carried by a casting vote. He had before thought, and he still thought, the best way was to appoint a committee to prepare a system that would accommodate the varying ideas of gentlemen. He had voted yesterday against the proposition made, under the impression that provision was thereby to be made for the judges. This he thought quite premature, before it was known that the act would be repealed; as it was at any rate doubtful whether one-half of the Senate did not think the meditated repeal a violation of the Constitution. He thought, for harmony, it were better to refer the bill to a select committee. The session would be two or three months longer, and if the report made by the committee should not prove agreeable, there would be time enough to bring in another bill. This attempt to harmonize all parties can do no injury, while, on the other hand, a system might be framed that gentlemen may be better pleased with than even a repeal of the act.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, he flattered himself the subject was well understood by the Senate. What is now the question? The same that has been so often decided. Gentlemen, in opposition, have said amend, but do not repeal. He could say that every vote of that House, in every stage of the discussion, had said repeal and do not amend. He believed the old system required but little amendment. It was the best suited to the interests of the United States and of the States. The law of the last session was in fact a bar to improvement. Gentlemen say, why not provide for these judges as you have provided for a judge of the Supreme Court? He would reply that the last operation was simple and easy of execution; but how were we in this mode to get rid of the circuit judges without having these courts in one part of the Union and not in another?

The gentleman from New Jersey has said that this measure is admitted to be bold and violent. By whom is it admitted? Not by me, or gentlemen who think with me. As to a regard to the Constitution, there is no man here, let his boast of federalism be what it may, who can take stronger ground than I hold. Gentlemen profess a great respect for the Constitution; but our principles are not to be evidenced by mere professions. They are to be evidenced by the series of our actions. My conduct, said Mr. N., since the formation of the Constitution to this day, is known by those who know me, as well as the conduct of gentlemen is known by those who know them. To the people I appeal. I am not to be alarmed by the tocsin of hostility to the Constitution that is so loudly sounded in our ears. I hope, sir, we shall have the question.

The question was then taken on Mr. DAYTON's motion by yeas and nays, and resulted—yeas 15, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Colhoun, Chipman, Dayton, D. Foster, Hillhouse, Howard, J. Mason, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, Ross, Sheafe, Tracy, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

There being an equal vote, the VICE PRESIDENT declared himself in the affirmative, and the reference was carried.

The VICE PRESIDENT said he felt disposed to accommodate the gentlemen in the expression of their wishes, the sincerity of which he had no reason to question, to ameliorate the provisions of the bill, that it might be rendered more acceptable to the Senate. He did this under the impression that their object was sincere. He should, however, discountenance, by his vote, any attempt, if any such should be made, that might, in an indirect way, go to defeat the bill.

A committee of five members was then balloted for; the following is the result of the ballots:

Mr. BALDWIN 16, Mr. COLHOUN 16, Mr. DAYTON 15, Mr. ANDERSON 15, Mr. MORRIS 15, Mr. BRECKENRIDGE 14, Mr. BROWN 14, Mr. CHIPMAN 14, Mr. HILLHOUSE 14, Mr. COCKE 11, Mr. ELLERY 2, Mr. S. T. MASON 2, Mr. ROSS 2.

The five first named constitute the committee.

THURSDAY, January 28.

The bill to repeal in part the act, entitled "An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. ANDERSON, ELLERY, and LOGAN, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill for the protection of the commerce and seamen of the United States in the Mediterranean and adjoining seas, together with the motion made yesterday for expunging the third and fourth sections; and Ordered, That the bill be committed to Messrs. BALDWIN, MORRIS, and SHEAFE, further to consider and report thereon.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

I lay before you the accounts of our Indian trading houses, as rendered up to the first day of January, 1801, with a report of the Secretary of War thereon, explaining the effects and the situation of that commerce, and the reasons in favor of its further extension. But it is believed that the act authorizing this trade expired so long ago as the third of March, 1799. Its revival, therefore, as well as its extension, is submitted to the consideration of the Legislature.

The act regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes will also expire on the third day of March next. While, on the subject of its continuance, it will be worthy the consideration of the Legislature, whether the provisions of the law inflicting on Indians in certain cases the punishment of death by hanging, might not permit its commutation into death by military execution; the form of the punishment in the former way being peculiarly repugnant to their ideas, and increasing the obstacles to the surrender of the criminal.

These people are becoming very sensible of the baneful effects produced on their morals, their health, and existence, by the abuse of ardent spirits, and some of them earnestly desire a prohibition of that article from being carried among them. The Legislature will consider whether the effectuating that desire would not be in the spirit of benevolence and liberality which they have hitherto practised towards these our neighbors, and which has had so happy an effect towards conciliating their friendship. It has been found too, in experience, that the same abuse gives frequent rise to incidents tending much to commit our peace with the Indians.

It is now become necessary to run and mark the boundaries between them and us in various parts. The law last mentioned has authorized this to be done, but no existing appropriation meets the expense.

Certain papers explanatory of the grounds of this communication are herewith enclosed.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 27, 1802.

The Message and papers therein referred to were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. JACKSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 17th of December last, the letter of Simon Willard to the Secretary of the Senate, relative to a clock executed by the said Willard for the use of the Senate, together with his account therefor, made report, which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the memorial of Narsworthy Hunter, stating that he is appointed a Representative in Congress of the Mississippi Territory, and the inconveniences to which he is subjected from the delay of the bill extending the privilege of franking letters to the delegate from the Mississippi Territory, and making provision for his compensation. Whereupon, the bill was read the second time and referred to Messrs. JACKSON, TRACY, and BALDWIN, to consider and report thereon.

Ordered, That the following resolution be referred to the same committee.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill providing for the payment and extending the privilege of franking to any person who may attend as a member of the House of Representatives from any district under the jurisdiction of the United States.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday.

That — be, and they are hereby, appointed a committee to inquire whether any, and, if any, what regulations are proper to be adopted respecting public officers and agents who shall squander public money officially entrusted to them, with leave to report by bill, bills, or otherwise.

And the motion was adopted.

Ordered, That Messrs. TRACY, NICHOLAS, and OGDEN, be that committee.

FRIDAY, January 29.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have considered the resolutions of the Senate in respect to Lieutenant Sterret, the officers, and crew of the United States schooner Enterprize, and do not concur therein. They have passed two resolutions expressing the sense of Congress on the gallant conduct of Lieutenant Sterret, and the officers and crew of the United States schooner Enterprize; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The resolutions were read, and ordered to the second reading.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 28th instant, the bill for the protection of the commerce and seamen of the United States in the Mediterranean and adjoining seas, reported the bill without further amendment; and the report was adopted.

Ordered, That this bill pass to the third reading as amended.

MONDAY, February 1.

The resolutions expressing the sense of Congress on the gallant conduct of Lieutenant Sterret, the officers, and crew of the United States schooner Enterprize, were read the second time, and, by unanimous consent, had a third reading.

Resolved, That the Senate do concur therein.

The bill, entitled "An act for the protection of the commerce and seamen of the United States in the Mediterranean and adjoining seas," was read the third time.

On motion, to add to the preamble these words: "whereby a state of war now exists with the said Regency;" it passed in the negative.

Resolved, That this bill pass as amended.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill authorizing the payment of two thousand eight hundred dollars to Philip Sloan; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, had a second reading.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. CHIPMAN, DWIGHT FOSTER, and WRIGHT, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE gave notice that he should, to-morrow, move for the discharge of the committee, appointed the 27th of January last, to whom was referred the bill to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes, with instructions to consider and report the alterations which may be proper in the Judiciary System of the United States.

TUESDAY, February 2.

Mr. ROSS presented the memorial of Jared Ingersoll and others, counsellors, practising in the courts of Pennsylvania, and in the Circuit Court of the United States, for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, submitting their unanimous opinion, deliberately and anxiously formed, that the circuit court, on the principles of its present organization, is an important medium for the administration of justice, and that the abolition of the court will probably be attended with great public inconvenience; and the memorial was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. Ross, on presenting the above memorial of the bar of Philadelphia, against the repeal, observed that it was not his intention to embarrass the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky,* by moving, in the present stage of the business, its reference to the committee now proposed to be dissolved. He offered it, that the Senate, having before them the opinions of a respectable set of men, might be properly impressed by them. The opinions expressed were unanimous, and were strongly enforced in a letter accompanying the memorial, addressed to his colleague and himself, and signed on behalf of the bar, by Messrs. Dallas and McKean, the one the Attorney of the District, and the other the Attorney General of Pennsylvania.

A Message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill to authorize the settlement of the account of Samuel Dexter, for his expense in defending against the suit of Joseph Hodgson, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read, and ordered to the second reading.

The following Message was received from the
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

I now lay before you—

1. A return of ordnance, arms, and military stores, the property of the United States.

2. Returns of muskets and bayonets fabricated at the armories of the United States at Springfield and Harper's Ferry, and of the expenditures at those places; and,

3. An estimate of expenditures which may be necessary for fortifications and barracks for the present year.

Besides the permanent magazines established at Springfield, West Point, and Harper's Ferry, it is thought one should be established in some point convenient for the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia. Such a point will probably be found near the border of the Carolinas, and some small provision by the Legislature, preparatory to the establishment, will be necessary for the present year.

We find the United States in possession of certain iron mines and works, in the county of Berkley, in the State of Virginia, purchased, as is presumed, on the idea of establishing works for the fabrication of cannon and other military articles by the public. Whether this method of supplying what may be wanted will be most advisable, or that of purchasing at market, where competition brings everything to its proper level of price and quality, is for the Legislature to decide; and, if the latter alternative be preferred, it will rest for their further consideration in what way the subjects of this purchase may be best employed or disposed of. The Attorney General's opinion on the subject of the title accompanies this.

There are, in various parts of the United States, small parcels of land which have been purchased at different times for cantonments and other military purposes. Several of them are in situations not likely to be accommodated to future purposes. The loss of the records prevents a detailed statement of these until they can be supplied by inquiry. In the mean time, one of them, containing eighty-eight acres, in the county of Essex, in New Jersey, purchased in 1799, and sold the following year to Cornelius Vermule and Andrew Codmas, though its price has been received, cannot be conveyed without authority from the Legislature.

* Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, the preceding day, gave notice that he should this day move to discharge the committee.

I enclose herewith a letter from the Secretary of War, on the subject of the islands in the lakes and rivers of our northern boundary, and of certain lands in the neighborhood of some of our military posts, on which it may be expedient for the Legislature to make some provision.

TH. JEFFERSON.

FEBRUARY 2, 1802.

The Message was read; and,

Ordered, That the Message and papers therein referred to lie for consideration.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE introduced the motion, of which he gave notice yesterday, that the committee appointed the 27th of January last, to whom was referred the bill to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes, with instructions to consider and report the alteration which may be proper in the Judiciary System of the United States, be discharged.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE.—It will be recollected I yesterday gave notice, that I should this day move to discharge the select committee, to whom the judiciary bill was last week committed. As there are some gentlemen now in the Senate who were not present during any part of the discussion, I deem it proper to say a few words as to its progress, and as to the real situation in which it now stands.

Early in January this discussion commenced, on a resolution going to the unqualified repeal of the judiciary law of last session. After many days' debate, and at the moment when the question was about to be put on the resolution, a motion was made to transform it into a resolution for the amendment, instead of the repeal of the law. This was negatived. The resolution was then passed; a bill brought in; and carried to the second reading, when another motion was made to recommit it to a select committee, for the purpose of amending the system. This was also negatived. The bill was then ordered to its third reading, and, on the question for its passage, another motion was made for its commitment to a select committee, and carried by the casting vote of the Chair. In this situation it now rests.

During the whole of the discussion, those who were in favor of the repeal uniformly argued and voted against anything like amendment. They over and again avowed it as their opinion, that they would not consent to go into any amendments in the judiciary system, until that law was repealed; that they considered its existence as an insuperable bar to all amendments; and that indeed the only great amendment which they wished for, at this time, was a repeal of that law, the obnoxious tendencies of which were, cancer-like, to be certainly removed by cutting it out by the roots.

On the other hand, the gentlemen in opposition contended, that the law was enacted and made with great deliberation and wisdom; that it was essential to the due administration of justice, and to the peace of the nation; that it requires no amendment, that it cannot be amended; for that even admitting the courts and judges erected by that law were useless and burdensome, yet Congress have not the power to put down those courts and judges, because they are in under the Constitution. We are therefore at issue upon the simple point, shall this law be repealed or not.

From this state of things, what can be expected from the labors of this committee? Can they, on the one hand, forward the views of those who carried to a third reading a bill to repeal a certain act which they considered as fundamentally vicious, by attempting to amend that act? Or, on the other hand, can they forward the views of those who think this law the result of experience and wisdom, and moreover fastened on the nation by the Constitution, by attempting to make radical changes in it? Can they, in short, from two such contradictory and opposite opinions, opinions at variance in principle and not in detail, ever hope to produce anything that will be satisfactory to both sides? They cannot, and it appears to me impossible that gentlemen can seriously expect it.

I consider it, Mr. President, as a great contest on principle, and not on detail. A committee cannot, and ought not to settle principles. On the floor of this House alone ought principles, furnishing the ground-work of legislation, to be originated and settled. Details only are proper from your select committees. We cannot abandon this question. It cannot be suffered to escape us, or be entangled in forms. It must be settled. We will have no modification of this bill. We must, on this floor, meet the plain unqualified question of repeal. And in order that we may be enabled to do so, I now move you, that the committee to whom the bill was referred on Wednesday last, be discharged from proceeding further therein. The bill will then be ready for its passage, and the whole merits of the subject open to discussion.

Mr. DAYTON.—I should not have arisen so soon in the debate, had the member from Kentucky been more correct in the information he has given the Senate. It must be recollected by the Senate, contrary to the gentleman's statement, that neither the first, second, or third motions made on the subject were the same. The first motion was to revise and amend, instead of repeal the act of the last session, and was negative; the second was for revising the whole Judiciary system, and connecting therewith a proposition to make provision for the judges, which had been disapproved of by one honorable gentleman, and also negative; the third so far differed from the second, as to be agreeable to that honorable member, and was agreed to. A committee was appointed. He recollected the anxiety of the friends of the honorable member, and of the honorable member himself, at not being one of the committee. He was sorry his anxiety had produced the extravagant proposition on the table. Is not the gentleman's ambition satisfied? He might have been contented with the agency he already had in this business. He had already delivered two speeches that had been listened to with attention.

Gentlemen had, in the first stages of this business, been permitted to take their own course; while employed in the holy work of destroying the Constitution, they were suffered to go on, until their course was arrested by the reference of the bill. He would ask, if, when the subject was so referred, for the purpose of revising the whole Judiciary system, it was proper, wise, or decent, to discharge the committee, without their asking their discharge? He trusted a majority would not be found to sanction such a step. He trusted one at least, perhaps many, would be found among those in favor of a repeal, who would vote against discharging the committee. He trusted that a regard to appearances would save them from sanctioning such a procedure. The committee had not been inattentive to their duty. No such thing was even suggested. He trusted, therefore, the proposition would be rejected, and that in its adoption would not be found a practical comment on the conciliatory recommendation of the President, which had been echoed by gentlemen on that side of the House.

Mr. ROSS.—I have long had the honor of a seat in this House, and this is the first time I have ever heard a motion for the discharge of a committee, unless by a member of the committee itself. And what is the reason assigned? Difference of opinion on principle. With whom existed this difference? Surely not with one political side distinguished from another. For we have just heard the opinions of gentlemen of high talents, and of firm adherence to the same politics as those of the honorable gentleman, stating that the system is susceptible of amendment. Are gentlemen prepared to decide instantaneously, without information, against opinions so respectable? Surely this would not be legislating with accustomed caution: Are gentlemen prepared to say there is no middle ground? The wisest men deliberate the longest. Why then not wait until the committee report? Hear what they offer. If bad, reject it, but first hear. What appearance would this hasty procedure present? One day the Senate are equally divided, and, by a caution and moderation not easily forgotten, the bill is referred. Afterwards, though opinion is strengthened on one side, all modification whatever is rejected, and the subject is brought forward for a hasty decision. This Mr. R. did not think wise. He hoped the House would proceed cautiously. He hoped they would not proceed by rapid steps to a point that might be attended with serious consequences.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE.—It is said that what I have done should satisfy a moderate man, and that my ambition should be satisfied. But what ambition can I feel? What prospects of ambition lie before me, in proposing the repeal of this law; when, instead of opening prospects of office to me, the effect is directly the reverse, by destroying those very offices which I might expect? No, sir, my ambition on this, as I trust it will be on all other occasions, is to put down a system fundamentally pernicious. I have stated the grounds on which I deem it so, and I am ready to meet the sentiments of my country.

We are now told that we are to suspend this business for a short time to stop us from sealing the death-warrant of the Constitution. Let me tell these gentlemen, whatever expressions of terror they may make, that they pass by my ear like the wind, and leave not a trace behind. Where is the precipitation talked of? Did not this discussion originate on the eighth of January, and did not the business travel as slow as it could? Had not gentleman acknowledged it had been fully and deliberately discussed? He knew but one subject which had been so fully discussed. What can this select committee do? Have gentlemen answered my arguments on this point? If our opinions on the constitutionality of the bill are so various and contradictory, what can we expect from the magic of a committee but delay? I am sure, therefore, gentlemen are not serious, when they profess an expectation that the report will furnish a plan of accommodation. The principle must be settled here.

Mr. MORRIS begged leave to mention, that the statement made by the honorable member from Kentucky as fact, was not fact. Half of it was true; the gentleman had said we will listen to no amendment, we will have a simple repeal. But it was not true, that this side of the House had declared the system was pure, and admitted not of amendment. It had, on the contrary, been acknowledged by every member that had spoken, to be capable of improvement, and gentlemen had been called upon to point out the defective parts.

But, says the gentleman from Kentucky, we will have no modification of the bill. Is that gentleman, then, the keeper of the consciences of half the House, and the other half too? This is a degree of presumption I never before heard of—that he should get up and say that nothing could be offered which would be approved of. Mr. M. believed a system could be devised better than either the old or the new one.

Nay, Mr. M. said, he would appeal to the language of the gentleman himself, who had told us that, after all, we were content to repeal the law so that we spared the judges. Did not a member from Connecticut declare that he had voted against the law last session, believing it then, and still believing it to be a bad one? He could go on citing every member, that had spoken on his side, to the same effect.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE.—The gentleman last up has misunderstood what I have said, and built all his observations upon it. I appeal to the House, whether I did not state, in so many words, when I made the motion to-day, that all the gentlemen in the opposition had, during the whole course of the discussion, contended that the courts and judges could not be put down? I have not said that all the gentlemen in the opposition were opposed to any amendment in the system, and, therefore, there was no possibility of the committee's forming any system to meet the wishes of both sides of the House.

Mr. COCKE spoke in favor of the motion.

Mr. S. T. MASON.—I thought my friend from Kentucky had stated grounds that would not have been treated so rudely and abruptly by the gentleman from New York, who had so sternly reproached him with the charge of presumption. His friend had stated truly, that the question was repeal or not repeal, and it was on this question that the House had so often decided. As to the idea of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that to discharge the committee would be indecent and improper, he really did not see in what possible light it was so. Committees were the mere creatures of the House—even the Committees of the Whole—and nothing was more common than to discharge them. This had been often done, and yet no complaint had been before heard of it.

[Mr. MASON here cited an instance in the Senate, where two members of a committee of three were prepared to report, when the third member, who was against the report, on motion, obtained the discharge of the committee.]

Mr. ANDERSON said, as he was one of the select committee, he thought it his duty to inform the House, that on his making inquiry, he found it had been determined by the committee to admit of no amendments to the system that were not connected with a provision for the judges. This fact would enable the Senate to judge what prospect there was of a report that would be satisfactory to them.

Mr. DAYTON contested the fact, and declared, that though one of the committee, he had no recollection of it. Mr. D. then went somewhat at large into the subject of reference.

Mr. ANDERSON replied.

Mr. TRACY.—In my opinion, few committees have been raised for more important purposes than that now proposed to be discharged; it has been raised for the purpose of considering and reporting such amendments as it would be expedient to make to the whole Judiciary system of the United States. They have sat but a short time; too short, I conceive, to be prepared to decide on the objects for which they were appointed, with sufficient deliberation and maturity of thought. What light has been shed upon the subject since their appointment to alter the course of proceeding then marked out by a Constitutional majority of the Senate? If proper then, is it not equally proper now to aim at a plan of accommodation? No new arguments have been urged. Are gentlemen determined at all events not to change their opinions? This would be improper. Daily instances occur—he hoped they always would occur—and he was sure they would occur in proportion to our desire of imbibing correct opinions, founded on truth. It will be recollected what fell from the Chair on that memorable day, that if the object of gentlemen appeared to be delay, it would not be permitted; but when the House was nicely balanced, it was desirable to give an opportunity to those who desired to devise a plan of accommodation.

Are gentlemen sincerely for making the plan as unexceptionable as possible? They may have their wishes gratified by giving us an opportunity of improving it; and then, if our amendments are not agreeable to them, they may reject them.

I voted for the act of the last session because I thought it a good one; I still think it so; but I declare that, for the good of my country, I will sacrifice all my pride of opinion, and immolate it unhesitatingly whenever that good requires. Is not prudence and caution pre-eminently required at this time? Does not the state of parties, for parties there are, require that we should heal, instead of irritating their wounds? If in this body to-day, one party adopts a particular measure, and to-morrow another party by accident gains an ascendance and destroys it, what would be thought of our proceedings? Was this the dignified mode in which legislation should go on? He was sure gentlemen would not in their hearts say so.

Mr. MORRIS spoke against the motion.

Mr. BALDWIN said, that from the subject as it now stood before the Senate, he was disposed to vote for the discharge of the committee, and that the Senate should itself proceed and finish the business. His reason was, that his own mind was made up to come to a decision on the main question, which had been for a month under discussion; and he had no reason to believe but that this was the case with the other members of the Senate. He also thought there could not be expected a more favorable moment to come to a fair and proper decision. He hoped he should never be in any Legislative Assembly in which it would not be his wish to have the actual majority of the Legislature make the laws and decide all legislative questions. It would give him great pleasure to see every member of the Senate present on this occasion; next to that was the pleasure of having reason to believe that the decision will now be the same as if the whole number was present; he had no doubt but it was generally so understood. This is the highest evidence that can be had in any deliberative assembly of what is their duty, and is the only thing that can be expected to give the most general and permanent satisfaction. He thought it very far from being a disrespect to the committee, or an unusual mode of proceeding; when the Senate is not ready to proceed in a business, they either postpone, commit, or adjourn it; whenever, in the opinion of the majority, the cause for the delay is removed, whether by the labors of the committee or of an individual member, the House proceed in the business, discharge the Committee of the Whole or the select committee, as is seen in every day's practice of Parliamentary Assemblies.

In the discussion of this morning, gentlemen appeared to have, in a great degree, given up what they had before considered their strong ground, viz., the superior excellency of the new judiciary system of last session, now proposed to be repealed. The argument this morning has turned on the incompetency of that system, and the importance of keeping the committee in session, to devise another new one, to be composed out of both the former ones. He must beg leave to submit to the candor of the gentlemen, whether, if that was at present the state of their minds, they had not better let the old system, which has been in operation ever since the beginning of this Government, with which the country is well acquainted, and to which they have been so much accustomed, be continued in operation till their minds are more settled, and till more time can be given to mature and perfect amendments and alterations, which it seems now to be proposed to make as to juries, and other important provisions, which seem now to be in contemplation. He was very unwilling to distract the country by many propositions of new judiciary systems, following each other every session of Congress; he thought it more clearly evident than before, that it was best to go on and restore the old system for a year or two longer at least. As a member of the committee, he must declare it as his opinion, that there was very little prospect of their devising a new one, during the remainder of the present session, which would be so likely to be acceptable as the old; especially as it had never been pretended that the old one was so extremely vicious and intolerable that it might not be continued a year or two longer, till experience and reflection could devise something in which we could be more unanimous than in anything which has as yet presented itself.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. JACKSON, S. T. MASON, and WRIGHT, for the motion, and Mr. ROSS against it.

The yeas and nays were then taken, and were—yeas 16, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Chipman, Colhoun, Dayton, Dwight Foster, Hillhouse, J. Mason, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, Ross, Sheafe, Tracy, Wells, and White.

So it was Resolved, That the said committee be discharged.

WEDNESDAY, February 3.

The bill to authorize the settlement of the account of Samuel Dexter, for his expense in defending against the suit of Joseph Hodgson, was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. TRACY, DWIGHT FOSTER, and BROWN, to consider and report thereon.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The Senate resumed the third reading of the bill to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes.

On motion by Mr. ROSS, to amend the first section, by adding thereto, "excepting so much thereof as relates to the courts thereby established in the third district;" it was determined in the negative—yeas 14, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chipman, Dayton, Dwight Foster,

YAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

Mr. BRADLEY thereupon rose.—Mr. President, I shall vote for the repeal, because it seems to me that we have got no use for these courts. The business was decreasing when they were appointed, and the old system seems to me to be much better than the new one. The lawyers of Philadelphia like the new one best, but it is for their interest to have a great many courts. Now, Mr. President, I look upon the repeal of this law only as one part of a great system. The system recommended by our worthy President, is a system of more glory than our country ever had. This system is to be completed by lessening all our expenses; by reducing our Military Establishment; by disciplining our militia; by repealing our internal taxes; and then, sir, we shall soon pay our debts, and with a great population of free citizens, we shall make all the tyrants of Europe tremble on their thrones, and in the middle of their armies. None of them will dare to attack this country. This is a glorious system. And then, Mr. President, I do not see how this can be so unconstitutional as the gentleman in the opposition pretend. The words in the Constitution, "to hold during good behaviour," have been interpreted very differently in different States; so I think we cannot apply to the States to fix a right meaning to these words. Well, who then shall we apply to? It seems to me we ought to apply to that country where these words were first used. Now, sir, in that country an act of Parliament can put down any courts or judges, though they do hold their offices during good behaviour. I do not see then, sir, why an act of Congress should not put down courts and judges in this country. The judges will still hold their offices during good behaviour, as much as they do in England.

Besides, Mr. President, I think if we interpret the Constitution as these gentlemen propose, it will amount to a perpetuity for this expensive system; because when a judge dies out, the President is bound to fill up his place; and even if they should all happen to die together, he must appoint sixteen new ones; so I don't see how we are ever to get rid of this system; 'tis an absolute perpetuity, unless God should be moved, as he was by the sins of the old world, to destroy us all by a flood. So, sir, I shall vote for the repeal.

Mr. ROSS.—I regret extremely that by an absence from the earlier part of this session, I have lost the interesting information which has been offered by the able and eloquent discussion of the question. When the intelligence reached me that such a bill was proposed, I lost no time in repairing to my seat, that I might, at least, discharge the melancholy duty of entering my solemn protest against a measure more pernicious in its nature, and more fatal in its consequences, than any ever proposed in this House.

Having already [in the debate on Mr. Ross's 7th Con.—6 motion to except the third circuit from the repealing law] stated my reasons for preferring the present to the former organization of the circuit courts of the United States, I shall repeat nothing respecting expediency, but confine myself strictly to an examination of our Constitutional power to pass the bill now under consideration. And in doing this, I do not mean to deny the power of Congress to add new judges to existing courts; to forbid the filling of vacancies so as to lessen the number of judges; to devolve new duties upon the courts, or take away old, but unnecessary jurisdiction; nor will I dispute their authority to abolish a particular court, where it can be no longer employed for the purposes of its institution, provided such abolition be attended with regulations guarding against the violation of public engagements. All these points may be safely conceded, and the concession will at once silence those gentlemen, who have as erroneously as boldly asserted, that the law of the 13th February, 1801, embraces a principle and furnishes a precedent as broad and as pernicious as the present.

That law declares that the first vacancy in the Supreme Court of the United States shall not be filled up. This would reduce the future number of that court to five.

How does this affect the independence of the court, or of any member of it? Surely there is no breach of your engagement with any individual, nor can I discover what gentlemen intended to condemn.

The same law, in the 24th section, provides that the district judges of Kentucky and Tennessee shall be component members of the courts in the sixth circuit; and it is now asserted that thereby the old courts are abolished, the judges divested of their old commissions, and appointed by the Legislature to fill the new offices vested by that act. But when the old system is examined, we find that the judges in those States had the power of holding circuit courts as well as district courts within their respective States. That by the late law they still remain judges of the circuit courts as before, and retain all the powers of district judges. That, as some new duties have been devolved upon them, a large additional compensation for their services has been added to their original salaries; and that they have all their original jurisdiction and more; they sit in the same court, hold the same office, have the assistance of other judges; they lose none of their independence, but gain a great increase of compensation. The law of 13th February, 1801, then displays the sacred regard of the last Congress for the Constitutional permanency of the Judiciary, instead of furnishing a precedent for the Legislative removal of judges from office.

By the bill on your table, the Legislature asserts and exercises the new and dangerous power of abolishing all the circuit courts of the United States, of removing from office all the judges of these courts, erecting new courts of the same name and with precisely the same jurisdiction, to be held by other persons, who are designated in the bill. The judges are displaced, not because you will no longer employ circuit judges—for you appoint and employ other circuit judges; the courts are nominally abolished, not because inferior or circuit courts of the United States are useless, or the purposes of their institution at an end—for other courts, of the same name, with the same powers, and for precisely the same purposes, are enacted by this very bill. Whatever its title may be, the bill itself is nothing less than an act of the Legislature removing from office all the judges of all the circuit courts of the United States. It is a declaration that those officers hold their offices at your will and pleasure. That by law you signify your preference of other men, and that these shall serve you no longer.

This is a direct and palpable violation of the Constitution. After providing for the internal security of a nation, the great care of every legislator is directed towards the pure and prompt administration of justice. It is for the attainment of this great end, that government is principally instituted, and the people are happy, or miserable, as the Judiciary is pure, wise, and independent, or otherwise. The Executive, and Legislative authority, instead of being in their nature paramount, are rather auxiliary and subservient in promoting the free and irresistible operations of the judicial power. In our national Government these three great powers are clearly separated, and deposited in different hands. It is a Government of departments, each representing and exercising the sovereignty for a particular purpose, and each prohibited from encroaching upon or exercising the powers of another.

By article third, sections one and two, the judicial power is vested in a Supreme Court, and such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time establish. The judges of all courts of the United States are to hold their offices during good behaviour, and to receive a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

The provision for their independence, both of Legislative and Executive power, was wise and absolutely indispensable. From the Constitution itself they have a transcendent jurisdiction, not only between citizen and citizen, but between a State and citizen, between different States, and between the United States and the several States. It would have been preposterous to subject the courts to those whose acts they are directed to interpret and control. The laws of Congress organizing the courts, define the number of judges in each court, fix their compensations and designate the extent of their jurisdiction. But the tenure of office is not derived from the laws, but from the Constitution; Congress cannot erect courts to be held by judges commissioned during the pleasure of the Executive, or of the Legislature, or during five or ten years only; such a law and such a tenure would be clearly unconstitutional.

But it is contended, that although the Constitution prohibits the Executive and Legislature from displacing a judge directly or by name, yet the Legislature may abolish the office, and thereby indirectly effect the same end. For then there will be no office in which the judge can continue, nor any service rendered for which he ought to receive a compensation. There is no violation then of the letter of the Constitution, and the Legislature are the sole judges of its true spirit.

I answer, that no device, however subtle, will protect us in producing a forbidden result. An unlawful end cannot be reached by lawful means. This is a moral and logical truth of the old school, which I believe the new philosophy will find no process of reasoning to overturn; and I should be obliged to any ingenious gentleman for stating a syllogism which would produce such a conclusion. I know well that, by metaphysical abstractions, you may imperceptibly gain a little and a little more, until at last the illusion of the fallacy is scarcely within the compass of detection; but here, where every step can be so distinctly traced, the delusion is impossible. You admit that the dismissal of sixteen judges, by name, would be unconstitutional. What difference is there between this and your bill, which declares that the circuit courts shall no longer be held by the present judges, but by certain other men? You do not destroy the office of circuit judge, for you still retain the circuit courts. You remove the office from one set of men who now hold it, and give it to another set that pleases you better. Then you contend that this operation, being a removal of offices from men, is not a removal of men from office, as if your purpose was not as effectually attained by inverting the order of the words as without it; you say there shall be a removal, and yet admit that direct removal by you is unlawful. Surely so barefaced an evasion, so undisguised an usurpation of power, can deceive no man who is not already resolved to be deceived.

The honorable gentleman from Vermont has said, in this debate, that the words, "holding during good behaviour," used in the Constitution, have been very differently understood in the different States; and that the English courts, whose judges hold their office during good behaviour, may be abolished by an act of Parliament, which is held to be omnipotent.

The gentleman ought to recollect that there is no analogy in this respect between our national Government and that of Great Britain. There an act of Parliament can change the constitution. Here the written Constitution, established by the people, restrains the Legislature to the exercise of delegated power, and fixes immutably certain bounds which it may not pass. If it should rashly exceed the delegated power, our Judiciary, sworn to support the Constitution, must declare that the great irrepealable statute made by the people shall restrain and control the unauthorized acts of agents who have exceeded the limits of a special authority.

I could easily produce opinions of high respectability, from many of the States, showing that by the words, "during good behaviour," was understood a complete independence of the Legislative as well as Executive power, but at present I shall only refer to a case from Virginia, which is directly in point, and decided by men of great eminence, whose talents and political opinions will not be questioned by gentlemen who are friends of this bill. As the case and opinion are printed, and in the hands of everybody, I merely repeat that the judges of Virginia, Mr. Pendleton at their head, did refuse to execute a law of that State as unconstitutional, and assigned their reasons in writing, among which are the following :

"The propriety and necessity of the independence of the judges is evident in reason and the nature of the office; since they are to decide between Government and the people, as well as between contending citizens; and if they be dependent on either, corrupt influence may be apprehended, sacrificing the innocent to popular prejudice, and subjecting the poor to oppression and persecution by the rich. And this applies more forcibly to exclude a dependence on the Legislature, a branch of whom in cases of impeachment, is itself a party.

"This principle supposed, the court are led to consider whether the people have secured or departed from it in their Constitution or form of Government. In that solemn act they discover the people distributing the Governmental powers into three great branches, Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary, in order to preserve that equipoise which they judged necessary to secure their liberty; declaring that those powers be kept separate and distinct from each other, and that no person shall exercise at the same time an office in more than one of them. The independence of the two former could not be admitted, because in them a long continuance in office might be dangerous to liberty, and therefore they provided for a change by frequent elections at stated periods; but in the last, from the influence of the principle before observed upon, they declared that the judges should hold their offices during good behaviour. Their independence would have been rendered complete by fixing the quantum of their salaries."

After stating the vast increase of duty, without a correspondent increase of salary, which they deemed such an attack on their independence that it would be inconsistent with a conscientious discharge of duty to pass it over, they say :

"For vain would be the precaution of the founders of our Government to secure liberty, if the Legislature, though restrained from changing the tenure of judicial offices, are at liberty to compel a resignation by reducing salaries to a copper, or by making it part of the official duty to become hewers of wood or drawers of water."

From which there can be no doubt that in the opinion of the highest law characters in Virginia, the words "during good behaviour," even without a provision for compensation, do secure to the judges a complete independence of the Legislature, as well as of the Executive power, in the tenure of their offices; and should an indirect attempt be made upon that independence, either by withholding pecuniary compensation, or by devolving duties too burdensome, the judges themselves may take up the law, and declare it to be void. I shall only add that the Legislature of Virginia, with moderation and good sense highly honorable to themselves, yielded to the judges, and new-modelled their law.

The same gentleman from Vermont has also complained that all our inferior courts, as well as the Supreme Court, would, according to our doctrine, be unchangeable and eternal. This position is altogether incorrect and fanciful: for we admit that the Legislature may add to, or diminish jurisdiction; may forbid vacancies to be filled, and do many other acts contended for. But we deny that they can remove officers at their pleasure, and put others in their stead; that they can vacate the seats of all our criminal and civil judges, and fill them again with their own men. In one word, that they can assume Executive power over the Judiciary, and destroy and create in the same statute. The judicial power is in its nature as permanent and as unchangeable by the Legislature or Executive as the Constitution itself, and when it loses these attributes, we lose all security for property, for fame, and for life—we have nothing left that is worth preservation.

Some gentlemen have said in this debate, that the Supreme Court is better secured by the Constitution against the Legislature, than the inferior courts, and have made a grave distinction between the words "shall" and "may." I see no difference in the security of the judges of the respective courts. Try the efficacy of the new doctrine upon the Supreme Court. It is organized by law. The power which enacted, can repeal the law. We will remove the office from the judges, not the judges from the office. At present there are six judges in that court. There will be a Supreme Court if we repeal the law as to three. You may say the three eldest, the three youngest, or the three who wear wigs, shall hereafter hold the court. Nay, the principles of the present bill would warrant you in enacting that the present Supreme Court shall be abolished; and that the Supreme Court shall hereafter be held by the district judges, or any given number of them. And your justification is the same. You have legislated respecting the office only, although the fact will also be that the office is the same, but the officers are all changed by the new operation of your law.

By this horrid doctrine, Congress erects itself into a complete tyranny. All the judges of your civil and criminal courts hold their offices at the will of the Legislature. A majority of the two Houses is in reality the national Judiciary. "During good behaviour" means as long as the prevailing party in Congress choose to continue one of their own laws. When parties change, the judges must all go out. What can our citizens, what can strangers expect from such courts? If you pass laws impairing the obligations of contracts, or violating our public faith, or ex post facto in their operation, will our courts have courage enough to obey the Constitution and their oaths, by declaring such acts void? If you infringe the rights of a State, or deny the privileges secured to it by the Constitution, what remedy, what hope has the State? Will the judges dare to resist your law, or refuse to execute it? If they do, their doom is certain; you sweep away their offices by a law, and appoint others to do their duty; or you nominally erect new courts with the same jurisdiction, and leave the Executive to hunt for more pliant men. Nay, should the courts and the Legislature be in session at the same time, and in the same place, the whole business may, on Legislative whim or passion, be taken out of the hands of the court who had began to hear it, and given to men more favorable to the claims of popular suitors, or the acquittal of favorite criminals. The Legislature thus becomes a corrupt despotism, under which no wise man would live, and to which no freeman ought to submit.

Instead of an august and venerable tribunal, seated above the storms and oscillations of faction, prepared to rescue innocence from the fangs of the oppressor, to stand in the gap as mediators between the great officers of Government and the people, between the National Confederacy and the individual States; you have a transient, artificial body, without a will or understanding of its own, impelled by your own machinery, and destitute of the celestial fire which should animate and direct its course. It will be the mimicry and the mockery of justice. No more will you see in the administration of justice, those men, whose acquirements and talents have called them to eminence at the bar. They will never consent to become the tools and victims of factions contending for mastery in the State. Even mediocrity in the profession will not leave ease and dignified independence for a seat of precarious duration, and where the hazard of degradation is imminent and irretrievable. You must resort to the dregs of the law, to the pests of social life, where you may find impudence without science, zeal without judgment, self-sufficiency without moral principle, and we shall soon see executioners instead of judges in the sacred seats of justice. When popular leaders sue before such courts, their adversaries must be manifestly in the wrong, and when the ruling party accuses, the prisoner at the bar will never be found guiltless. Such a state of things is certainly deprecatd by every honorable member of this House, and yet, in my apprehension, this fatal measure, if carried through, will hurry us forward into calamity and misfortune beyond the faculties of man to foresee or describe. Let us then stop while we are yet safe, while the boundaries of our power and our duty are yet visible; while we have a Government founded on opinion, unaided by force and supported by affection; a Government secured by solemn covenant and compact to abstain from the exercise of prohibited power. Upon our observance of this easy condition hang the hopes and happiness of the new world. The day we transgress, we fall from our high and happy state. Touch not then the forbidden tree; the taste may perhaps be sweet, but the sin is mortal, and from that moment our Paradise is lost.

Mr. ANDERSON.—Mr. President, when the subject now under consideration was first brought before the Senate, I did not intend to have taken any part in the debate. But the alarm which the gentlemen in the opposition have attempted to excite, and the impression they have endeavored to make upon the public mind, impels me to offer a few reasons in justification of the vote I mean to give; and in offering these reasons I will endeavor to show, that if this law should not be repealed, it will, from the circumstances under which it passed, establish a precedent dangerous to the independence of this body, and subversive of the true principles of the Constitution. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (just sat down,) has said that we cannot make use of lawful means to obtain an unlawful end. We do not mean to attempt it. But I trust that the reverse of the gentleman's position is equally correct: that this House ought not to have made use of unlawful means to have obtained a lawful end. It was lawful for Congress to have passed the law under consideration. But I cannot admit that either House were at liberty to make use of unlawful means to effect it.

In order to show that such means have been used in the passage of the law, I must refer to the admission of a fact, by the honorable member from New York. He has conceded, and it was well understood, that if any amendment had been made to this law, when in the shape of a bill before the Senate, and the bill had thereby been returned to the House of Representatives, the voice of the people would there have been spoken—their veto would have been given, and the bill would never have passed into a law. It must further be admitted, for your Journals prove it, that several amendments to the bill would have obtained, had not three of your Senators, who were appointed judges, in consequence of the passage of this law, voted against the amendments; and I believe it will not be denied, that if this law had not passed, no new judicial offices would then have been created, and that if those three Senators had not voted upon the bill, the law would not have passed. It then fairly follows, that the votes of those Senators created new offices, which thereby made places for themselves. I mean not to impeach the integrity of those gentlemen. But thus I conceive, that unlawful means have been used to effect the passage of this law. Means, in my judgment, directly contrary to the true intent and meaning of the Constitution; for, by article first, section sixth, it is declared that no Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time. I believe, sir, it was intended by this clause, that no member of Congress should be capable of giving any vote that might directly or indirectly put him into office, and yet we have seen three Senators, under this very law, put into offices by the effect of their own votes. The honorable member from New York has told us, that he would wish us to be as virtuous as Romans; I, sir, would wish to see every member of this Senate not only virtuous, but without suspicion. In the passage of this law, and the appointments made out of this body in consequence thereof, I conceive the Constitution to have been dangerously infringed. I therefore consider it highly expedient, in order to preserve the sacred principles of our Government, to preserve the character and independence of the Senate, that this law, which has thus passed, should be repealed; for, if the Senate do not show their marked disapprobation by its repeal, it will countenance the practice which has been adopted, and virtually sanction the right of the President to select members from this body and place them in offices which have been created by their own votes, and thereby establish a precedent subversive of the true intent and meaning of the Constitution, and destructive of the independence of the Senate; for it is a maxim in all Governments, that what has been once done, and acquiesced in, from thenceforth becomes a precedent. May we not then expect that some future President, desirous of carrying some favorite point, will have recourse to the same expedient to provide for his warm friends or favorites, and thus, from time to time, by enlisting a sufficient number of members in his interest, may he not acquire a very dangerous ascendancy, and thus most injuriously extend Executive patronage—than which nothing is more dangerous to the principles of a free Government? It is laid down by Paley, a very able writer upon the subject of free Governments, “that patronage ‘universally is power—that he who possesses in a ‘sufficient degree the means of gratifying the desires of mankind after wealth and distinction, by ‘whatever checks and forms his authority may be ‘limited or disguised, will direct the management ‘of public affairs. Whatever be the mechanism ‘of the political engine he will guide the motion.” Let us, then, keep the Executive power within its due Constitutional limits—less, I wish it not to have, and more, I am unwilling to give.

SENATE.

I will now, Mr. President, offer a few observations upon the constitutionality of repealing this law.

The gentlemen opposed to the repeal of this law, upon Constitutional grounds, have said that it will destroy the independence of the judges; and in order to support this position, much pains has been taken, so to blend and consolidate the whole judicial power as to make the offices of the judges of the supreme and inferior courts rest upon the same tenure. This, sir, is highly politic; for if the gentlemen could really persuade some of us that this doctrine is correct, they might prevent the repeal. But, sir, from the most impartial examination which I have been able to give this question, I am of opinion that the Supreme Court is created, ordained, and established, by the Constitution, and must continue to exist; and there is centred that independence, so much desired by the gentlemen in the opposition, and absolutely necessary, in my opinion, in every free and well regulated Government. The Constitution contemplates the existence of the Supreme Court from the very first organization of the Government; for it not only says, the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish; but it expressly says, there shall be a Chief Justice, and that when the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside. Thus is the Chief Justice as expressly spoken of in the Constitution as the President, and I do believe that we might as well attempt to abolish the office of President as that of Chief Justice. Assistant justices are also necessary to fill up the true meaning of the Constitution, for without them there could not properly be a Chief Justice; there might be a justice, but he could not be a chief, unless there were subordinate justices. Our Constitution was formed at a time when parties did not exist—the framers, no doubt, expected our first Legislature would organize the Government in all its parts, in conformity with the true intent and meaning of the Constitution, according to the principles of sound reason and common sense. Upon those principles has our Supreme Court been organized, and the judges thereof must, in my opinion, continue to hold their offices independent of the Legislature, and cannot be removed but by impeachment. But, sir, the courts intended to be abolished by the repeal of this law, having been created by Legislative will, and not by the Constitution, they are, in my opinion, in the power of that body who created them, in the same manner as the judges of the Supreme Court are in the power of the people, who created the Constitution, by which they hold their offices, and from which they can be removed by the people whenever they choose to change their Constitution. The power of Congress over the inferior courts having been very ably elucidated by several gentlemen who have preceded me, and with whom I accord in opinion, it being now late, I will make but few more observations before I conclude. I mean, however, Mr. President, to extend my views to that country from which we derive almost our whole system of jurisprudence, which has uniformly been acknowledged the best in the world, and principally on account of the great independence of the judges, and compare the independence of the judges of England with that of the American judges. I have said that our supreme judges are in office by the Constitution, consequently not removable at the will of the Legislature. The English judges are differently situated—they have no fixed Constitution to protect them, and are liable to be removed in two ways, either by the address of Parliament, or by the repeal of the law—yet have they long been considered as independent, because they are no longer removable at the pleasure of the King. But, sir, the judges of our inferior courts are more independent than those of England, for the judges of our inferior tribunals cannot be removed from office but by a repeal of the law which created their offices, or by impeachment. I have thought proper to take this concise view, and thus to compare the independence of the American judges with those of England, because from that country have we borrowed our ideas of the necessary and proper independence of a judge, and on the comparison we find that under the construction we give to the Constitution, the American judges are infinitely more independent than those of England. The fears, therefore, of the gentlemen in the opposition, which they have painted in so lively colors, must certainly be unfounded, and believing that it is both expedient and Constitutional to repeal the law, I shall give my vote for the passage of this bill.

Mr. OGDEN.—Mr. President, those who may vote for the repeal of the late judiciary law, must be prepared to say, in the first place, that the new system has not advantages over the old, which will compensate the difference of expense; and then, secondly, that the Judiciary branch of the Government is altogether dependent on the Legislative branch.

As I cannot, Mr. President, subscribe to either the one or the other of these propositions, I feel it to be a duty, which I owe to my constituents and myself, to lay before the Senate those sentiments which shall actuate my vote on this occasion.

The only reason which I recollect to have been urged by the honorable mover of the resolution, upon which this repealing law is predicated, was, that there were no benefits in the new system, so superior to those in the old system, as would justify the additional expense. I shall, therefore, in the first place, examine and compare the principles of these two systems, in this view of the subject.

Permit me to observe, Mr. President, that, in my apprehension, the duties of the judges of the Supreme Court, and the duties of judges of inferior courts, as contemplated by the Constitution, are distinct duties, and that the old system is objectionable, because it assigns to the same set of men, these distinct, and in some measure, incompatible offices.

To show that these offices are thus distinct, I beg leave to refer to the Constitution, which in article one, section eight, says, "Congress shall have power to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court." Thereby plainly contemplating the one court as distinct from the other.

Again, article three, section one, provides that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices," &c. From whence the inference is irresistible, that the office of a judge of the one court was designed, by the Constitution, to be distinct from the office of a judge of the other courts; and that this conclusion is right, beyond all question, is manifest from the next section of the same article, which provides, that in two of the cases to which the judicial power of the United States was extended, "the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction, and in all other cases, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction." Now, nothing in nature can be more distinct than the office of the judges to whom an appeal is made, and the office of the judges from whom an appeal is made; and yet under the old system, the function of these entirely distinct and incompatible offices were performed by the same persons, who on one day sat as judges of an inferior court, exercising original jurisdiction in the cause, and, in a few days after, as judges of a Supreme Court, exercising appellate jurisdiction in the self-same suit.

This solid objection against the old system is remedied by the new.

But it has been urged, that this objection may be done away by preventing the same judge who gave his opinion, while sitting in an inferior court, from giving an opinion in the same cause, when sitting in the Supreme Court. I answer, that in such case, you must always lose one-sixth of the benefit of this great national tribunal, and frequently much more. It may happen, that in the same suit one judge may decide an important question of jurisdiction, upon a plea in abatement at one inferior court, and another judge the merits upon a question for a non-suit at the next court, and a third judge upon the form of action upon a motion in arrest of judgment at a succeeding court. Now, in cases like these, the Supreme Court would be reduced to one half of its number, and it might be shown that the most important questions, affecting the most important interests of this great community, under the Constitution, might be finally decided, upon writ of error, by two, nay, even one judge.

Let me ask, Mr. President, are there not a sufficient number of actors to be found who can, with ability, fill all the great characters in this great national drama? Or are we so poor, that in order to save a cent a man, we must compel one set of persons to play two parts? I hope, sir, this is not the case, but that the improvement which has been made in this particular alone, will be found worthy of the additional expense which it creates.

But, sir, there is another objection to the old system, now about to be revived, which appears to my mind to be insurmountable. I mean the natural impossibility of all the functions both of judges of the Supreme Court and inferior courts, of courts of original and courts of appellate jurisdiction, being performed by the six judges of the Supreme Court, either with tolerable convenience to themselves or to the public.

This position will, I think, be manifest when we consider the extent of this vast country, and that the same six judges must hold inferior courts of original jurisdiction twice in each year, in each State, (except in Tennessee and Kentucky,) and that all the judges must assemble twice a year in this Capitol, to officiate in the Supreme Court in the exercise of their appellate jurisdiction, so that the age and agility of a post-boy would be more necessary qualifications for judges, than that appropriate maturity and gravity for which they have been selected. Candor must admit, that to revert to this old system, would be to place upon our judges a most intolerable task and burden.

Again, under this old system, courts were frequently lost; a judge sometimes was sick, sometimes the rains descended, the floods rose, the roads became broken up, so as to render it impossible to hold the inferior courts at the prescribed times; by this means, suitors, parties, jurors, and witnesses, were disappointed, and thus was produced the law's delay; which is the greatest curse that can attend it.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Judiciary System.

SENATE.

Besides, you might see one judge beginning a cause, another and another deciding, in its intermediate progress, and a different one entirely making the rendition of judgment.

These facts, sir, are completely proved by the memorial from the bar of Pennsylvania, now lying on the Secretary's table, and it has been admitted that if the testimony of the majority of the bar within the United States could be obtained, that it would prove the same thing.

That the new system remedies all these inconveniences, has not been disputed, and now it is about to be thrown away to save the community a paltry cent per man; no, not so much, not a cent.

But, sir, it has been objected that the judges of England ride the circuit of that kingdom, and decide many more causes than come before our courts.

Let me ask, whether, because twelve judges, assisted by as many other men learned in the law as they may require, to hold in their stead courts of Nisi Prius, can in England accomplish their business in an extent of three hundred miles square, does it follow that in this country, six judges, unassisted, can perform as much business over an extent of country of sixteen hundred miles square? And yet it has been so argued. Admirable logic indeed!

It has been further objected, that the State courts may be resorted to for that business which, by the Constitution has been assigned to the Courts of the United States, whereby the additional expense of the late establishment may be saved. What! are we so poor that the United States must thus ask alms from the individual States, by declining to continue a proper provision for such courts as may be necessary for the determination of the causes that may arise under the Constitution and laws of the United States? We might as well, upon the same principle, ask the State Governments to perform for the United States its Executive and Legislative duties; and what will this mighty saving be? the smallest part of a miserable cent apiece. Such a want of provision of a competent number of judges on the part of the United States, to afford prompt and convenient justice, in all cases arising under our Constitution and laws, is not only, in my mind, unworthy of this country, but seems like a denial to our citizens of the benefit of those stipulations made in their favor when that Constitution was adopted which brought us, and now binds us together.

It may be here worthy of remark, that if the State courts are to be resorted to, and the Legislature should take away appeals from such courts to the Supreme Court, as they seem authorized to do by the second section of the third article, which provides that "the appellate jurisdiction shall be liable to such exceptions, and such regulations as Congress should make;" then it will happen, that all Constitutional questions between the General Government and State Governments, must be decided by State tribunals; and everything thrown back, as far as relates to this subject, to that state of things which existed under the Old Confederation.

But, sir, in my apprehension of this subject, the Legislature were bound to have made provision for a competent number of national courts of original as well as appellate jurisdiction; the one to be filled by inferior, and the other by Supreme Court judges. When this provision has been made, and when it is upon the full tide of successful experiment, is it wise, is it prudent, thus shortly, without the test of experience, to throw away these provisions, for the miserable savings now contemplated?

It has been, moreover, objected, that the business of the national courts has decreased, and that the same necessity for the new establishment, as formerly, does not now exist.

Permit me, sir, to observe that, while our population is increasing beyond all former example, while our treaties are growing in number, and our statute book is enlarging, it is a necessary consequence that the business of our courts must increase; and if business did not increase under the old system, it is a conclusive proof that that system was radically wrong. I admit that it is very difficult to make a provision exactly commensurate with the public wants; but it is certainly more safe to have such provision too broad than too narrow; and as the system must be uniform, it must be so extensive as to afford a speedy and convenient administration of justice to such portions of the country as most require it.

The result, Mr. President, of this comparison, under all these circumstances, clearly is, according to my judgment, that the system has such advantages over the old, as well in its greater propriety as in its perfect practicability and superior convenience, as will, by many times, outweigh that trifling additional expense which ought never have been set up against it.

But, sir, the gentlemen on the other side of the room appear to me, in a great measure, to have given up this point, and seem ardent to rush, even without a necessity, to give such a construction to the Constitution, as will render the Judiciary entirely dependent on the Legislature; this opens a great Constitutional point, to the discussion of which I approach with trembling.

It appears to me, sir, that the three pillars, namely, the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial, upon which our Government stands, are entirely independent of each other; that the functionaries in these three great departments are irresponsible to each other, and that they equally derive their official being and existence immediately from the Constitution itself, and not from any laws which may, from time to time, become necessary to bring these great departments into complete operation.

I say, sir, they are independent of each other, because there is no dependence or connexion between them, created by the Constitution; the first article whereof, sections one and two, provides for the Legislative, the manner in which they shall be chosen, and the term of their offices. So article two, section one, provides in like manner for the Executive; and article three, section one, makes similar provisions for the Judicial. Now, sir, the sages who framed this Constitution would not have made these branches thus co-equal, co-ordinate, and independent of each other, if they had intended that either one might, by a law, be rendered dependent on either of the others; they perfectly knew, that it is as natural in politics as attraction is in physics, that the greater body must eventually draw within its vortex every lesser one, unless balanced and counteracted; they, therefore, instead of creating any dependence of any one branch upon any one of the others, which they would have done if they had so intended, have expressly provided that the Executive should continue in office for four years, Senators for six years, Representatives for two years, and Judges during good behaviour. How can it be said that one co-ordinate branch can abridge the time of the political existence of either of the others? And who can show that, if the Legislature can do this in regard to one of the other branches, why it may not do the same in regard to the other?

It has been observed, that independent judges for life may become dangerous, by having a complete control over your laws. I answer, that we are here not making but acting under the Constitution which has created this independence, and we are bound not to impair it. But, sir, I believe that the independence is in perfect conformity with the genius of the American people, and that it is dear to them.

Our forefathers came from a land where this independence existed in the then greatest extent in the known world. They boasted of it with pride to their children, as the highest birthright of a free citizen. They complained incessantly that here it was not so; that their judges were not independent, and this very reason, in our Declaration of Independence, is assigned as one of the causes of our separation from our mother country.

All the American Constitutions, in conformity to this idea, have endeavored to preserve the same independence of judges, by the most express terms, and the instrument now under consideration, uses the most unequivocal language that human wisdom can dictate, to secure (as far as it can be secured by paper) the independence of the Judiciary. Suffer me further to observe, that our Government is one of checks; that the power given by the Constitution to the Legislature is not general, but special; that it is not omnipotent, but limited; and that, therefore, necessarily a check against it must somewhere exist. Suppose the Legislature should pass bills of attainder, or an unconstitutional tax, where can an oppressed citizen find protection but in a court of justice firmly denying to carry into execution an unconstitutional law? What power else can protect the State sovereignties, should the other branches combine against them? And let me ask, where can such power be more safely lodged than in that branch of the Government, which, holding neither the sword nor the purse of the nation, cannot have either the ambition or the means of subverting, to their own benefit, the provisions of our Constitution? I contend, sir, that by our Constitution, judges are not only independent, but irresponsible, except in the mode therein pointed out, which is by impeachment, and if liable to be put down in any other way, they will become dependent and servile creatures. If the proposed law obtains, they will be put down without impeachment, without trial, and for no reason whatever, except it be, either to save the smallest part of a miserable farthing, or on account of the great sin of having been appointed under the former Administration. I hope, sir, that such an unworthy reason, or such vindictive passions, will never operate to produce a measure which will shake and diminish the confidence which considerate men have hitherto had in that security, which they thought they possessed under this Constitution.

The argument most worthy of notice from the other side of the House, appears to me to be that which is founded on an idea that the judges about to be put down were not created by the Constitution, as it is said the judges of the Supreme Courts were, but by the Legislature; and that as the creature cannot be out of the reach of the creator, so these judges must be dependent on the Legislature.

First, I answer, that no sound distinction can be made between the tenures by which judges of the supreme and judges of the inferior courts hold their offices, according to the Constitution, and it having been admitted in argument, that the judges of the Supreme Court are not thus liable to be put down, it follows that judges of the inferior courts are not thus liable. But, sir, a distinction has been aimed at; it has been said, that the word shall has been used in reference to the one, and the word may in reference to the other; but I believe the word shall is equally applicable to both cases. Take the words, "the judicial power shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, establish." Can any one doubt that the word shall is not equally imperative in the cases of both species of courts, and that the evident meaning of the Constitution is, that Congress shall appoint as well inferior court judges as Supreme Court judges, and that the word may is only introduced to take away, in regard to the inferior courts, that limitation which is made in respect to the Supreme Court? The language then is, there shall be but one Supreme Court, although there shall be as many inferior courts as Congress may establish. But this distinction, in regard to the tenure by which these respective judges hold their offices, altogether vanishes from my mind when I read in the Constitution that the judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour? The wit of man could not have invented more explicit terms. But it is said, that a law was necessary to bring into official existence the judges of inferior courts. I answer, a law was equally necessary to bring into official existence judges of the Supreme Court, and a law for the purpose was actually passed. How, then, can it be said, the one corps is created by the Constitution, and the other by a law? The truth is, sir, that no such distinction exists as the one which has been set up; and if the present law passes, it will be an irresistible precedent to any future Legislature who may be disposed, by a law, to put down the Supreme Court judges, and no ingenuity will be able to point out any solid distinction between the two cases.

Again, Mr. President, it is evident that the necessity of having made a law, in order to give official being to these judges, does not make them dependent on the Legislature, or prove that they do not hold their offices under the Constitution; because if such reasoning were good, it would equally prove, that the President, Vice President, Senators, and Representatives, do not hold their respective offices under the Constitution; but under those respective laws which have been necessarily passed to bring them into existence; such as the laws for the appointment of electors for election of Senators and Representatives, and for determining the number of Representatives by fixing the ratio. Will any one pretend, that by repealing the respective laws under which elections have been had, and the number of Representatives ascertained, that thereby the tenure of their offices, in respect to the time of duration, as fixed by the Constitution, can be impaired? Permit me to mention one more case: by section three, of article one, it is provided that new States may be admitted by Congress into this Union. Now, laws for this are absolutely necessary, such laws have passed; but, when passed, will any say that the political existence of these new States depends on the laws? No, sir, it depends on the Constitution, and, for this reason, a repeal of such laws, after admission, cannot annihilate the new States or affect their independence.

The necessary result of this inquiry is, that the office of inferior judges is derived from as high a source—and is equally independent of the Legislature—as that of the judges of the Supreme Court, the President, Vice President, Senators, and Representatives; that the official life and being of each is derived from the Constitution, and that the Legislature has been merely the organ made use of under the Constitution in bringing them into existence.

Has our Constitution then provided for our citizens this immense security of independent tribunals, and shall the Legislature now render them dependent on its own will and pleasure? Life, as well as property, may be at stake before our courts, and are they to be filled by independent judges, who are regardless equally of the smiles or frowns of men in power, or by the dependents of the party coming in and going out of office at each alternate change? Violent times have happened in other countries; there may be such times here; and if our criminal tribunals are then filled by the miserable minions of power, who can answer for the consequences? Who can say that blood will not flow down our streets in torrents?

I see gentlemen on the other side of the House are smiling; but I beg them to recollect that such things may be brought home to ourselves; that I am not putting an extreme case; what has happened may happen. We have seen in France a Constitution universally adopted, and fidelity sworn to it in the face of Heaven; we have seen one independent branch of the Government first trench upon and then destroy another independent branch; we saw then the criminal tribunals filled, not with independent judges, but, instead thereof, with monsters and executioners, the vile dependents of the National Legislature, who were themselves, by means of these very tribunals, under the control of the infamous Robespierre; these cruelties were succeeded by another Constitution, and another; the independence of the National Legislature was, in its turn, trenched upon by the Executive, and finally, all the several branches of Government swallowed up together by the transaction at St. Cloud. I beg gentlemen to remember these awful dispensations of Providence: we are informed by the sure word of prophecy, that "the measure we mete unto others shall be meted unto us again; and if we sow the wind, we shall reap the whirlwind."

Bear in mind I beseech you, that justice is evenhanded, and that she may return to our own lips the bitter ingredients of this same bitter cup. Recollect that times have been when a Legislature has been turned out of their hall by armed soldiers; nay, stamped out of existence. Let us not, I pray, set an example which may hereafter plague us. Let us not be the first independent branch of the Government, which shall attempt the independence of another co-equal and co-ordinate branch. Let us follow the maxim of wisdom by resisting beginnings.

The gentlemen on the other side of the House have been peculiarly called the friends of the people; remember a friend in need is a friend indeed. Is there, then, not some one who will step out from among them to save this tottering branch of our Government from falling! Rest assured, it is dear to our fellow-citizens. Ask them, and every highminded American will answer at once, "Save us from the injustice, the oppression, and the miseries of dependent tribunals, by preserving to us, forever, the entire independence of our national judges."

Mr. NICHOLAS rose with the Constitution in his hand, but shortly after opening the book, and looking at it, sat down again.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE.—Mr. President: While my honorable friend recollects himself, I beg leave to say a few words in answer to an argument which has been much pressed to-day. I did not intend to rise again on this subject, especially at so late an hour (about five o'clock) and I promise to detain the House but a few minutes.

I did not expect, sir, to find the doctrine of the power of the courts to annul the laws of Congress as unconstitutional, so seriously insisted on. I presume I shall not be out of order in replying to it. It is said that the different departments of Government are to be checks on each other, and that the courts are to check the Legislature. If this be true, I would ask where they got that power, and who checks the courts when they violate the Constitution? Would they not, by this doctrine, have the absolute direction of the Government? To whom are they responsible? But I deny the power which is so pretended. If it is derived from the Constitution, I ask gentlemen to point out the clause which grants it. I can find no such grant. Is it not extraordinary, that if this high power was intended, it should nowhere appear? Is it not truly astonishing that the Constitution, in its abundant care to define the powers of each department, should have omitted so important a power as that of the courts to nullify all the acts of Congress, which, in their opinion, were contrary to the Constitution?

Never were such high and transcendent powers in any Government (much less in one like ours, composed of powers specially given and defined) claimed or exercised by construction only. The doctrine of constructions, not warranted by the letter of an instrument, is dangerous in the extreme. Let men once loose upon constructions, and where will you stop them. Is the astutia of English judges, in discovering the latent meanings of law-makers, meanings not expressed in the letter of the laws, to be adopted here in the construction of the Constitution? Once admit the doctrine, that judges are to be indulged in these astute and wire-drawn constructions, to enlarge their own power, and control that of others, and I will join gentlemen of the opposition, in declaring that the Constitution is in danger.

To make the Constitution a practical system, this pretended power of the courts to annul the laws of Congress cannot possibly exist. My idea of the subject, in a few words, is, that the Constitution intended a separation of the powers vested in the three great departments, giving to each exclusive authority on the subjects committed to it. That these departments are co-ordinate, to revolve each within the sphere of their own orbits, without being responsible for their own motion, and are not to direct or control the course of others. That those who made the laws are presumed to have an equal attachment to, and interest in the Constitution; are equally bound by oath to support it, and have an equal right to give a construction to it. That the construction of one department of the powers vested in it, is of higher authority than the construction of any other department; and that, in fact, it is competent to that department to which powers are confided exclusively to decide upon the proper exercise of those powers: that therefore the Legislature have the exclusive right to interpret the Constitution, in what regards the law-making power, and the judges are bound to execute the laws they make. For the Legislature would have at least an equal right to annul the decisions of the courts, founded on their construction of the Constitution, as the courts would have to annul the acts of the Legislature, founded on their construction.

Although, therefore, the courts may take upon them to give decisions which impeach the constitutionality of a law, and thereby, for a time, obstruct its operations, yet I contend that such a law is not the less obligatory because the organ through which it is to be executed has refused its aid. A pertinacious adherence of both departments to their opinions, would soon bring the question to issue, in whom the sovereign power of legislation resided, and whose construction of the law-making power should prevail.

If the courts have a right to examine into, and decide upon the constitutionality of laws, their decision ought to be final and effectual. I ask then, if gentlemen are prepared to admit, that in case the courts were to declare your revenue, impost and appropriation laws unconstitutional, that they would thereby be blotted out of your statute book, and the operations of Government be arrested? It is making, in my opinion, a mockery of the high powers of legislation. I feel humbled by the doctrine, and enter my protest against it. Let gentlemen consider well before they insist on a power in the Judiciary which places the Legislature at their feet. Let not so humiliating a condition be admitted under an authority of resting merely on application and construction. It will invite a state of things which we are not justified by the Constitution in presuming will happen, and which (should it happen) all men of all parties must deplore.

Mr. MORRIS.—I rise to congratulate this House, and all America, that we have at length got our adversaries upon the ground where we can fairly meet. They have now, though late, reached the point to which their arguments tended from the beginning. Here I knew they must arrive, and now I ask, if gentlemen are prepared to establish one consolidated Government over this country? Sir, if the doctrine they advance prevail, if it be the true doctrine, there is no longer any Legislature in America but that of the Union.

All the arguments they have used in this debate went, of necessity, to that conclusion which is now happily avowed. The honorable member tells us the Legislature have the supreme and exclusive right to interpret the Constitution, so far as regards the making of laws; which, being made, the judges are bound to execute. And he asks where the judges got their pretended power of deciding on the constitutionality of laws? If it be in the Constitution (says he) let it be pointed out. I answer, they derived that power from authority higher than this Constitution. They derive it from the constitution of man, from the nature of things, from the necessary progress of human affairs. When you have enacted a law, when process thereon has been issued, and suit brought, it becomes eventually necessary that the judges decide on the case before them, and declare what the law is. They must, of course, determine whether that which is produced and relied on, has indeed the binding force of law. The decision of the Supreme Court is, and, of necessity, must be final. This, Sir, is the principle, and the source of the right for which we contend. But it is denied, and the supremacy of the Legislature insisted on. Mark, then, I pray, the result. The Constitution says, no bill of attainder, or ex post facto law shall be passed, no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration to be taxed; no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State; no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another. Suppose that, notwithstanding these prohibitions, a majority of the two Houses should (with the President) pass such laws. Suppose, for instance, that a capitation tax (not warranted by the Constitution) or a duty on exports were imposed. The citizen refuses to pay; but courts dependent on the will and pleasure of the Legislature are compelled to enforce the collection. Shall it be said, that there is an appeal to the Supreme Court? Sir, that appeal is subject to such exceptions and regulations as Congress shall make. Congress can, therefore, defeat the appeal, and render final the judgment of inferior tribunals, subjected to their absolute control. Nay, sir, to avoid all possible doubt or question, the honorable member last up has told us in so many words, that the Legislature may decide exclusively on the Constitution, and that the judges are bound to execute the laws which the Legislature enact. Examine then the state to which we are brought. If this doctrine be sustained, (and it is the fair logical deduction from the premises laid down) what possible mode is there to avoid the conclusion that the moment the Legislature of the Union declare themselves supreme, they become so? The analogies so often assumed to the British Parliament, will then be complete. The sovereignty of America will no longer reside in the people, but in the Congress, and the Constitution is whatever they choose to make it.

I saw the end to which those arguments went but I would not throw it out to the people. Gentlemen will however recollect, that early in this debate I prayed them to pause and consider. I mentioned to them without this bar the result of their doctrine, and yesterday I warned them to beware of deciding on abstract propositions. But they insisted on the decision, and they still persist; let me then ask, what safety is left for the States?

Experience under the old Confederation had shown, that applications made by Congress to large communities were nugatory, and that to carry on the business of the National Government, it should be invested with a right of applying directly to individuals. But then the danger that it might swallow up the sovereignty of the States became evident. To provide against that danger, the Constitutional doctrine was established, that no power should be exercised by Congress but such as was expressly given, or necessarily incident, and as a farther security, provision was made prohibiting certain definite acts. But of what avail are such securities, when your Legislative authority is to be bounded only by your own discretion?

While I was far distant from my country, I felt pain at some things which looked like a wish to wind up the General Government beyond its natural tone; for I knew, that if America should be brought under one consolidated Government, it could not continue to be a Republic. I am attached to Republican Government, because it appears to me most favorable to dignity of sentiment and character. I have had opportunities to make the comparison. But if a consolidated Government be established, it cannot long be republican. We have not the materials to construct even a mild monarchy. If, therefore, the States be destroyed, we must become the subjects of despotism.

It may perhaps be said that all judges are bound by oath to support the Constitution; but I ask, how is that to be done? Their power over your laws is denied, and when once it is established that you and you alone are the legitimate interpreters of the Constitution, they must be bound by your construction.

Gentlemen may flatter themselves that the danger from this quarter is remote or ideal. I know that so long as peace shall last, the States will be the general favorites, because they offer numerous objects to gratify little ambition; but no sooner shall this country be involved in war, than all men will look up to the National Government for patronage and protection. Having then the command of a large military force, it must, under the construction now set up, become supreme. Remember that the old Congress conferred (without authority) dictatorial power over a large extent of country, and that it was exercised and submitted to without opposition. Gentlemen in this House represent the sovereignty of the States. I now call upon them. Are they ready to prostrate that sovereignty at the feet of the General Government? I, sir, on the part of the State of New-York, beg leave to enter my solemn protest.

MR. JACKSON.—Mr. President, the gentleman from New-York really frightened me; for there is nothing I fear so much as a consolidated Government in America. I think as he does, sir, that the moment it takes place there is an end to our liberty. But upon reflection, I think that gentleman has raised an alarm without foundation; for he says, sir, that if the Congress should pass laws injuring the States, the inferior courts would execute them, because they are to be dependent upon the will of Congress. But, sir, if the gentleman will look at the Constitution, he will find it is there said, in the second section of the third article:—"In all cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact." The gentleman therefore may dismiss his fears, as to what may be done by the inferior courts, for there is always an appeal to the Supreme Court. I have always considered the independence of the several States as the safeguard of our liberties; they are the sixteen pillars which support the great arch of our empire, and I hope that nothing will ever be done to shake them.

MR. DAYTON.—Mr. President, what has fallen from the gentleman who has just sat down, reminds me of the story of a man who boldly denied the existence of a Deity, and undertook to prove it from Scripture. He opened the sacred volume, and read therein the words, "there is no God." A bystander, who was not disposed to take such things upon trust, took up the book and recited the whole phrase: "The fool hath said in his heart there is no God;" and the position of this daring infidel vanished into air. Upon the same frail foundation rests the answer which has just been given by the last speaker to the irresistible arguments of my honorable friend from New York. It was stated by my honorable friend most distinctly, that although it might be pretended that there was an appeal from the inferior courts to the Supreme Court, yet, as that appeal was subject to such exceptions and regulations as Congress should make, it was in the power of Congress to defeat it altogether. The gentleman from Georgia has undertaken to prove, from the Constitution, that my honorable friend was mistaken; and how has he done it? He reads these words, "In all other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact;" here he stopped, and grounded his argument on the part which he read. Had he carried his eyes to what follows in the same sentence, and in the next two lines, he would have found that the clause stands thus: "In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make," being precisely what the gentleman from New York had stated, and what the gentleman from Georgia had thought proper to contradict.

But, sir, the object of the last speaker was not the single one of making an impression by a partial quotation from the Constitution. He saw the delicate, dangerous, and alarming ground upon which the member from Kentucky, who had been the prime mover of this measure, and the mouth-piece of his party, had placed the subject, and he was emulous of diverting us who are in the opposition, from exhibiting those newly professed, although secretly harbored, doctrines, in their true colors. Their deformity and dangerous tendency have, however, been so ably and strikingly displayed by the honorable gentleman from New York, that they cannot fail to make a serious impression on the public mind. And whatever may now be said or concealed, it must hereafter be understood, that upon the success of this measure depended one of the most precious provisions of our Constitution.

The question was then taken on the final passage of the bill and determined in the affirmative—yeas 16, nays 15, as follows.

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Chipman, Colhoun, Dayton, D. Foster, Hillhouse, Howard, J. Mason, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, Ross, Sheafe, Tracy, Wells, and White.

So it was Resolved, That this bill pass, that it be engrossed, and that the title thereof be "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes."

THURSDAY, February 4.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill for the relief of Lyon Lehman; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read, and ordered to the second reading.

FRIDAY, February 5.

The bill for the relief of Lyon Lehman was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. BRADLEY, TRACY, and OGDEN, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. CALHOUN presented the memorial and petition of Adam Tunno and others, merchants, of Charleston, South Carolina, stating that they were owners of the ship South Carolina, Paul Post, late commander, taken by certain Spanish privateers, and carried by them to Palma, in Majorca, and there condemned with her cargo in the year 1799, under the edict of the King of Spain; and praying the interposition of Government for their relief; and the petition was read.

Ordered, That it be referred to the Secretary for the Department of State, to report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. ROSS presented the memorial of the merchants of the city of Philadelphia, signed Willing and Francis, and others, stating that severe injuries have been inflicted on their commerce during the late European war, from the predatory cruisers of the contending Powers; reparation for which has been demanded, and, in some measure, obtained from Great Britain and Spain; but in consequence of the convention lately ratified with the Government of France, they are precluded from recurrence to the justice of that nation for damages sustained; and therefore pray redress from their own Government; and the petition was read.

Ordered, That it lie for consideration, and that it be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 2d instant, the bill to authorize the settlement of the account of Samuel Dexter for his expense in defending against the suit of Joseph Hodgson, reported it without amendment.

Ordered, That the consideration of this bill be the order of the day for Tuesday next.

MONDAY, February 8.

The Senate took into consideration the memorial of the merchants of Philadelphia, presented on the 5th instant.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. BALDWIN, BROWN, BRECKENRIDGE, ANDERSON, and HILLHOUSE, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

TUESDAY, February 9.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill to authorize the settlement of the account of NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Colhoun, Ellery, Franklin, Jackson, S. T. Mason, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

The VICE PRESIDENT determined the question in the affirmative.

So it was Resolved, That this bill pass to the third reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read, and ordered to the second reading.

A motion was made "That a committee be appointed to take into consideration the expediency of continuing in force, and of revising and amending the act, entitled 'An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers.'"

And it was agreed that this motion lie for consideration.

Mr. JACKSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 22d of January last, the bill fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States, reported amendments; which were read.

Ordered, That they lie for consideration.

Mr. S. T. MASON gave notice that he should, on Thursday next, ask leave to bring in a bill to repeal the act, entitled "An act for the punishment of crimes therein specified."

WEDNESDAY, February 10.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from Mr. ARMSTRONG, one of the Senators of the State of New York, resigning his seat in the Senate.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Vice President be requested to notify this resignation to the Executive of the State of New York.

Mr. JACKSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 28th of January last, the bill extending the privilege of franking letters to the delegate from the Mississippi Territory, and making provision for his compensation; and to whom was also referred the motion that a committee be appointed to bring in a bill providing for the payment, and extending the privilege of franking, to any person who may attend as a member of the House of Representatives, from any district under the jurisdiction of the United States, reported amendments to the bill first mentioned; which were read and considered.

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

The bill to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. TRACY, BROWN, and SHEAFE, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. DAYTON presented the memorial of Abraham D. B. Marentille, stating that he had invented certain machines for the preservation of persons exposed to drowning by shipwreck, and praying a patent therefor; and the petition was read.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

The bill to authorize the settlement of the account of Samuel Dexter, for his expense in defending against the suit of Joseph Hodgson, was read the third time and amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass as amended.

The motion made yesterday, "That a committee be appointed to take into consideration the expediency of continuing in force, and of revising and amending the act, entitled 'An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers,' was agreed to, and referred to Messrs. ANDERSON, TRACY, and BROWN, to report thereon to the Senate.

THURSDAY, February 11.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 5th instant, the bill for the relief of Lyon Lehman, reported an amendment; which was read and disagreed to.

Ordered, That this bill pass to the third reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill making certain partial appropriations for the year one thousand eight hundred and two; and a bill to authorize the collection of fees due to the officers of the respective courts in the State of Maryland, from persons residing within the Territory of Columbia, by the marshal of the said district; in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills were read, and ordered to the second reading.

On motion, it was Ordered, That Mr. BRADLEY be on the committee to consider the bill authorizing the payment of two thousand eight hundred dollars to Philip Sloan, in place of Mr. CHIPMAN, absent with leave.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments yesterday reported by the committee to the bill extending the privilege of franking to the delegate from the Mississippi Territory, and making provision for his compensation; which report was amended and adopted, and the bill passed to the third reading as amended.

Agreeably to notice given yesterday, Mr. S. T. MASON obtained leave to bring in a bill to repeal an act, entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes therein specified;" and the bill was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Proceedings.

SENATE.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate took into consideration the amendments reported by the committee on the 22d of January last, to the bill fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States; and, after progress, the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 18.

The Message communicated yesterday from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES were read, as follows:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives :*

I now transmit a statement of the expenses incurred by the United States in their transactions with the Barbary Powers, and a roll of the persons having office or employment under the United States, as was proposed in my Messages of December the 7th and 22d. Neither is as perfect as could have been wished; and the latter not so much so as further time and inquiry may enable us to make it.

The great volume of these communications, and the delay it would produce to make out a second copy, will, I trust, be deemed a sufficient reason for sending one of them to the one House, and the other to the other, with a request that they may be interchanged for mutual information, rather than subject both to further delay.

TH. JEFFERSON.

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives :*

I lay before both Houses of Congress for their information the report from the Director of the Mint now enclosed.

TH. JEFFERSON.

FEBRUARY 17, 1802.

The papers referred to in the Messages were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. OGDEN, from the committee appointed on the 15th instant, reported a bill to authorize the President of the United States to convey certain parcels of land therein mentioned; and the bill was read, and ordered to the second reading.

Ordered, That Mr. S. T. MASON be on the committee to consider the bill to repeal in part the act, entitled "An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes," in place of Mr. LOGAN, absent with leave.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendments reported by the committee, on the 22d of January last, to the bill fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States.

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, February 19.

The bill to authorize the President of the United States to convey certain parcels of land therein mentioned, was read the second time; and it was agreed that it should lie for consideration.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES :

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives :*

In a Message of the 2d instant, I enclosed a letter from the Secretary of War on the subject of certain lands in the neighborhood of our military posts, on which it might be expedient for the Legislature to make some provisions. A letter recently received from the Governor of Indiana presents some further views of the extent to which such provision may be needed, I therefore now transmit it for the information of Congress.

TH. JEFFERSON.

FEBRUARY 18, 1802.

The Message and letter therein referred to were read.

Ordered, That the letter be referred to Mr. TRACY and others, the committee appointed on this subject the 15th instant, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 10th instant, the bill to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans; and therein to amend the act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, made a report; which was read.

Ordered, That this report lie for consideration.

Mr. BRADLEY communicated sundry resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Vermont; which were read, as follows:

State of Vermont, in General Assembly :

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Legislature, the following amendments to the Constitution of the United States would conduce to the happiness of the citizens thereof, by the establishment of an uniform mode for the choice of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States and of Representatives to Congress:

1st. That after the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and one, the choice of Electors of President and Vice President shall be made by the Legislature of each State, dividing the State into a number of districts equal to the number of Electors to be chosen in such State, and by the persons in each of those districts who shall have the qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature of such State choosing one Elector in the manner which the Legislature thereof shall prescribe; which district, when so divided, shall remain unalterable until a new census of the United States shall be obtained.

2d. That the elections of Representatives to serve after the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three, shall be by dividing each State, by the Legislature thereof, into a number of districts, equal to the number of Representatives to which such State shall be entitled, and by the people within each of those districts who shall have the qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature of such State choosing one Representative in the manner which the Legislature thereof shall prescribe; which district, when so divided, shall remain unalterable until a new census of the United States shall be obtained.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee to whom was referred on the 28th of January last, the bill to repeal in part the act, entitled "An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes," reported it without amendment.

WEDNESDAY, February 24.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

I communicate to both Houses of Congress a report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of our marine hospitals, which appear to require Legislative attention.

As connected with the same subject, I also enclose information respecting the situation of our seamen and boatmen frequenting the port of New Orleans, and suffering there from sickness and the want of accommodation. There is good reason to believe their numbers greater than stated in these papers. When we consider how great a portion of the territory of the United States must communicate with that port singly; and how rapidly that territory is increasing its population and productions, it may, perhaps, be thought reasonable to make hospital provisions there of a different order from those at foreign ports generally.

TH. JEFFERSON.

FEBRUARY 24, 1802.

The Message and papers therein referred to were read and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. MORRIS communicated sundry resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York, which were read, as follows:

Resolved, As the sense of the Legislature, that the following amendments ought to be incorporated into the Constitution of the United States, as a necessary safeguard against pernicious dissensions in the choice of a President and Vice President, and as the most eligible mode of obtaining a full and fair expression of the public will in such election:

1. That the State Legislature shall, from time to time divide each State into districts, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives from such State in the Congress of the United States; and shall direct the mode of choosing an Elector of President and Vice President, in each of the said districts, who shall be chosen by citizens having the qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature; and that the districts, so to be constituted, shall consist, as nearly as may be, of contiguous territory, and of equal proportion of population, except where there may be any detached portion of territory, not of itself sufficient to form a district, which then shall be annexed to some other portion nearest thereto; which districts, when so divided, shall remain unalterable until a new census of the United States shall be taken.

2. That in all future elections of President and Vice President, the persons voted for shall be particularly designated, by declaring which is voted for as President, and which as Vice President.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendments reported by the committee, on the 22d of January last, to the bill fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States, which were in part adopted; and, after progress,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed.

THURSDAY, February 25.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the bill fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States; which were in part adopted; and having agreed further to amend the bill, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 26.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the bill fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States;

Ordered, That the bill be recommended to Messrs. BRADLEY, NICHOLAS, and JACKSON, further to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The following Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

No occasion having arisen since the last account rendered by my predecessor of making use of any part of the moneys heretofore granted to defray the contingent charges of the Government, I now transmit to Congress an official statement thereof to the 31st day of December last, when the whole unexpended balance, amounting to twenty thousand nine hundred and eleven dollars and eighty cents, was carried to the credit of the surplus fund, as provided by law; and this account consequently becomes finally closed.

TH. JEFFERSON.

FEBRUARY 25, 1802.

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

Some statements have been lately received of the causes decided or depending in the courts of the Union in certain States, supplementary or corrective of those from which was formed the general statement accompanying my Message at the opening of the session. I therefore communicate them to Congress, with a report of the Secretary of State, noting their effect on the former statement, and correcting certain errors in it which arose partly from inexactitude in some of the returns, and partly in analysing, adding, and transcribing them, while hurried in preparing the other voluminous papers accompanying that Message.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives :*

I transmit, for the information of Congress, letters recently received from our Consuls at Gibraltar and Algiers, presenting the latest view of the state of our affairs with the Barbary Powers. The sums due to the Government of Algiers are now fully paid up; and of the gratuity which had been promised to that of Tunis, and was in a course of preparation, a small portion only remains still to be finished and delivered.

TH. JEFFERSON.

MARCH 1, 1802.

The Message and papers referred to were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate took into consideration the amendment reported by the committee, the 19th of February last, on the bill to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage; and the amendment was not adopted.

The bill making appropriations for defraying the expense of a negotiation with the British Government to ascertain the boundary line between the United States and Upper Canada, was read the third time; and after filling the blank with the words ten thousand,

Resolved, That this bill do pass, that it be engrossed, and that the title thereof be "An act making appropriations for defraying the expense of a negotiation with the British Government to ascertain the boundary line between the United States and Upper Canada."

Mr. CLINTON, from the committee to whom was recommitted, on the 25th instant, the bill for revising and amending the acts concerning naturalization, reported further amendments; which were read.

Ordered, That they lie for consideration.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments reported by the committee, on the 25th instant, to the bill for the better security of public money and property in the lands of public officers and agents; which were further amended and agreed to.

Ordered, That this bill pass to the third reading as amended.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 29th instant, a bill making appropriations for defraying the expenses which may arise from carrying into effect the convention between the United States and the French Republic, reported it without amendment.

SENATE.

Ordered, That the further consideration of this bill be postponed to Monday next.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee to whom the subject was referred on the 18th instant, reported a bill to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States; which was read.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a second reading.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. BECKLEY, their Clerk—

The House of Representatives have passed a bill to revive and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to augment the salaries of the officers therein mentioned," passed the second day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate. They have directed me to bring to the Senate a statement communicated to the House of Representatives by the President of the United States, with his Message of the 17th ultimo; and to ask of the Senate, in exchange therefor, the roll of the persons having office or employment under the United States, which was communicated to them with a Message of the same date.

The bill last mentioned was read, and ordered to the second reading.

Ordered, That the Secretary do carry to the House of Representatives the roll of the persons having office or employment under the United States, as requested in the above recited message.

SATURDAY, March 27.

The bill to revive and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to augment the salaries of the officers therein mentioned," passed the second day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, was read the second time.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the heathen;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments yesterday reported by the committee to the bill to repeal the internal taxes; and the amendments were in part adopted.

On the question, Will the Senate adopt that part of the report of the committee which goes to strike out the eighth section of the bill?

It passed in the negative—yeas 8, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Breckenridge, Clinton, Cocke, Colhoun, Franklin, Jackson, and Sumter.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Dayton, Ellery, T. Foster, Dwight Foster, Howard, Logan, S. T. Mason, Morris, Nicholas, Ogden, Olcott, Ross, Tracy, Wells, and White.

On motion to amend the 8th section, to be read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That all persons who shall, on or before the 30th day of June next, have any blank vellum, parchment, or paper, which has been stamped by the Superintendent of Stamps, and counter stamped by the Commissioner of the Revenue, and on which a duty has been paid to the use of Government, shall be entitled to receive from such Collector or Collectors of the Customs, or other revenue officers in the respective States or districts, as may be designated for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury, the value of the said stamps, after deducting in all cases seventeen and a half per cent.; and that the said officers are hereby authorized to pay the same: Provided, That the said blank vellum, parchment, or paper, be presented within four months after the 30th day of June next:

A motion was made to strike out "seventeen" and insert "seven;" which passed in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 2, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Breckenridge, Clinton, Cocke, Dayton, Ellery, T. Foster, Dwight Foster, Franklin, Howard, Jackson, S. T. Mason, Morris, Nicholas, Ogden, Olcott, Ross, Sumter, Tracy, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, and Colhoun.

MONDAY, March 29.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 25th instant, the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned," reported amendments to the said bill, and further, that the committee are of opinion that any additional provisions in the act to promote the progress of useful arts are unnecessary.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to repeal the internal taxes, and the amendments reported by the committee were in part adopted, together with further amendment.

Ordered, That the bill pass to the third reading as amended.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill making an appropriation for defraying the expenses which may arise for carrying into effect the convention made between the United States and the French Republic.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill making a partial appropriation for the support of Government, during the year 1802, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill mentioned in the said message was read, and, by unanimous consent, had a second reading.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. NICHOLAS, TRACY, and BALDWIN, to consider and report thereon.

The bill for the better security of public money and property in the hands of public officers and agents, was read the third time and amended, by striking out the third section, after the words "so much" the words "and no more, as near as may be." And in the same section, after the word "therefore," the words "as may be necessary," and section fourth, after the word "given," by expunging the word "public;" and

On the question, Shall this bill pass as amended? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 2, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Clinton, Cocke, Colhoun, Dayton, Ellery, T. Foster, Dwight Foster, Franklin, Howard, Logan, S. T. Mason, J. Mason, Morris, Nicholas, Ogden, Olcott, Ross, Sumter, Tracy, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley and Jackson.

So it was Resolved, That this bill pass, that it be engrossed, and that the title thereof be "An act for the better security of public money and property in the hands of public officers and agents."

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

The Secretary of State, charged with the civil affairs of the several territories of the United States, has received from the Marshal of Columbia a statement of the condition, unavoidably distressing, of the persons committed to his custody on civil or criminal process, and the urgency for some Legislative provisions for their relief. There are other important cases wherein the laws of the adjoining States, under which the territory is placed, though adapted to the purposes of those States, are insufficient for those of the territory, from the dissimilar or defective organization of its authorities. The letter and statement of the Marshal, and the disquieting state of the territory, generally, are now submitted to the wisdom and consideration of the Legislature.

MARCH 29, 1802.

The Message and papers therein referred to were read, and committed to Messrs. MORRIS, S. T. MASON, and HOWARD, to consider and report thereon.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill for the relief of Isaac Zane; also, a bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to retain a further sum on drawbacks for the expenses incident to the allowance and payment thereof, and in lieu of stamp duties on debentures;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill to revive and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to augment the salaries of the officers therein mentioned," passed the 2d day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. T. FOSTER, CLINTON, and TRACY, to consider and report thereon.

The bill for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States was read the second time.

On motion, it was agreed that this bill be the order of the day for Thursday next.

The bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. FRANK-LIN, BRECKENRIDGE, and SUMTER, to consider and report thereon.

The bill for the relief of Isaac Zane was read, and, by unanimous consent, had a second reading.

Ordered, That it be referred to the committee last mentioned, to consider and report thereon.

The bill last mentioned in the message from the House of Representatives last recited was read, and ordered to the second reading.

On motion that it be

Resolved, That the Secretary of the War Department be requested to prepare and lay before this House a statement of the expenses actually incurred in support of the late Military Establishment for the last year, for which accounts have been rendered; and likewise, an estimate of the sums necessary to defray the first year's expenses of the present Military Peace Establishment:

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration.

TUESDAY, March 30.

Mr. JACKSON, from the committee to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate of the 12th March, to inquire what further and more effectual means ought to be provided by law for the carrying the mail of the United States, reported a letter from them to the Postmaster General, and sundry letters and documents from the Postmaster General to the committee, in reply thereto.

Ordered, That the same be printed for the use of the Senate.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

The Secretary of War has prepared an estimate of expenditures for the Army of the United States during the year 1802, conformably to the act fixing the Military Peace Establishment; which estimate, with his letter accompanying and explaining it, I now transmit to both Houses of Congress.

TH. JEFFERSON.

MARCH 30, 1802.

The Message and estimate were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to retain a further sum on drawbacks for the expenses incident to the allowance and payment thereof, and in lieu of stamp duties on debentures," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. J. MASON, TRACY, and ELLERY, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. ROSS presented the petition of sundry merchants of the city of Philadelphia, signed Thomas Fitzsimons, and others, praying relief from the operations of the act passed May 13, 1800, entitled "An act to retain a further sum on drawbacks for the expenses incident to the allowance and payment thereof, and in lieu of stamp duties on debentures;" and the petition was read, and referred to the committee last mentioned to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act to repeal the internal taxes," was read the third time, and amended, by striking out of section 1st, line 2d, after the word

WEDNESDAY, March 31.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 29th instant, the bill making a partial appropriation for the support of Government during the year one thousand eight hundred and two, reported it without amendment.

Ordered. That this bill pass to a third reading.

Mr. FRANKLIN, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 29th instant, the bill for the relief of Isaac Zane, reported it without amendment. And on motion, the bill was amended, and ordered to the third reading as amended.

INTERNAL TAXES.

The Senate resumed the third reading of the bill, entitled "An act to repeal the internal taxes."

Mr. ROSS, of Pennsylvania, rose and said, he had not expected that bill to be called up for this day's discussion, and was of course unprepared to go into its merits with as much correctness as he had intended; but as the bill was now on its passage, he would make a few remarks. He said, whatever might be his conduct, were the laws laying the internal taxes now before the Senate to be passed for the first time, he had no hesitancy in opposing the repeal.

He was convinced that the public exigencies required the whole of our revenue, including these taxes, and that the future impost, and other revenues, had been overrated by the Secretary of the Treasury in his estimate. The sale of our Western lands had been charged as productive of the annual sum of $400,000. He had many reasons for doubting that result, as the best of them were already sold, as money would become scarce in this country on the introduction of peace in Europe, and as agriculture would be less profitable with the peace prices.

Our expected neighbors, too, in Louisiana, and the Western Territory becoming an independent State, as was contemplated, might have an influence which could not now be foreseen with much certainty. Upon the whole, he thought the sum of $400,000 much too high for that part of our revenue. He supposed the duties on impost and tonnage must suffer a considerable diminution from the introduction of peace in Europe, and wished, in a particular manner, that gentlemen would attend to the solemn pledge of these internal taxes, to pay the interest and principal of the public debt—especially the interest of foreign loans, referred to in the act passed March 3d, 1791, in which directions were given that a separate account of the duties on domestic distilled spirits and stills, &c., should be kept, to the intent that they should never be diverted. He adverted to all the laws laying and altering these internal taxes, and the solemn pledging of them for the payment of the interest and principal of foreign loans, and the promise to substitute other funds of equal value, if these were diverted. He called upon gentlemen to justify, if they could, this flagrant breach of public faith, which was contained in the abolishing of these taxes without any substitute; and, on pretence of having made savings of public expense, which he declared would amount to little more than savings on paper.

Mr. MORRIS.—Mr. President, not having expected that this question would come on before to-morrow, I shall not be able to deliver my sentiments with the brevity and method I could have wished for my own ease and the convenience of the Senate. Though unwilling to trespass on their patience, I must entreat their attention to a subject highly important; more so, perhaps, than it has yet been considered. And I must so much the more solicit their kind indulgence, as I cannot hope to offer amusement, much less to convey instruction. It would, indeed, be vain to attempt to decorate logical deduction, or the meager results of arithmetical calculation. I shall, therefore, merely endeavor to recall to the recollection of gentlemen who hear me, the ideas which have already passed in their own minds; and I pray them to cast off, for a moment, all prejudice which they may have taken up, and go patiently along with me, into the fair investigation of those points on which the question turns.

I mean, sir, to comprise what I have to say under three heads:

1st. I shall, on general principles, compare internal taxes with those on the importation of commodities.

2dly. I shall examine how far we can rely for revenue upon the latter, supposing no frauds to be committed; and 3dly. I shall consider the danger to which that revenue may be exposed by smuggling.

First, then, let us compare internal taxes with duties on merchandise imported. And here let me premise, that in subjects of this sort there is no universal proposition. We must legislate on principles generally true, and be careful not to assume an exception as the ground of a rule, or believe that one solitary fact is sufficient to disprove conclusions drawn from the general state of things.

In the comparison now to be made, the first leading feature is the superior cheapness of internal taxes. This may seem extraordinary, and perhaps paradoxical, after what we have seen and heard of the expense of collecting them. On that expense, however, I must observe, in the first place, that, by extending this tax to a greater variety of objects, the collection will cost less in proportion to the amount; and, secondly, that although the sparseness of population in particular districts may prevent, as to them, an economical administration, yet this special circumstance, the effect of which must daily diminish, ought not alone to induce a preference for another general system.

Taking things as they are, let us place this question of expense on its true ground. By the cost of collection, I understand the difference between what the Treasury receives and what the people pay. If the necessary sums be (as an internal tax) collected from the people immediately, they pay no more than what goes into the public coffers after deducting a certain per centage to the officers employed in the collection. But if the same sums be raised by duties on articles imported, it is evident that the merchant must take an advance on that part of his capital employed in payment of the duty, as well as on that which has been applied to the purchase and importation of the article. Where he received a credit for the duty this profit will be less in proportion to the length of that credit. The amount will necessarily vary according to a variety of circumstances; any hypothetical statement of it, therefore, to be tolerably accurate, must be so varied and diffused that we can better comprehend it as a logical proposition, than explain it as an arithmetical problem. The precise amount, moreover, is not essential to our present inquiry. The retailer purchases of the merchant with cash or credit. He of course pays, or engages to pay, the price; that is to say, the prime cost and charges (in which the duty is included) and the merchant's profit on both cost and charges: for these taken together constitute the merchant's price. After this, the retailer removes the commodity so purchased to the place where it is to be vended. It will be noted that in some cases articles pass through intermediate hands between the merchant and retailer, whereby an addition is made to the price, either as profit or as commission. But a consideration of these cases would render the inquiry too complex. Confining ourselves, then, to the simple transaction between the merchant and retailer, it is evident that when the latter has paid the price (including the merchant's profit on the duty) he must take a profit on the whole of that price, and on the charges he incurs for packages, freight, and transportation. In this profit he will of course include the interest of his own capital, or that which he pays to another for the use of money, or that which (in the shape of advanced price) he is bound to pay where he has purchased on credit. It is evident, also, that this profit must be sufficient to compensate him, not only for the employment of his stock, but for the labor and professional skill, by which he is to support himself and provide for his family. It is, therefore, equally evident that the advance must be great in proportion as the place in which he vends the goods is remote from that in which he made the purchase, and that it must increase when sales are slow, because a small profit often repeated is better than a large one which seldom recurs. On the whole, we may fairly conclude that the price of imported goods will be greatest in places most distant from the ports, and in those where (from the state of population or from other circumstances) the consumption is small. In such places, therefore, the duty will fall most heavily on the consumer.

It is proper, in this place, to distinguish between articles of mere luxury and those of real utility. It is of little consequence to the community that the luxurious should pay dear for the gratification of their appetites. It is indeed advantageous, because the high price of such things diminishes the consumption, operating thereby as a regulation of police or sumptuary law. But the case is widely different when we come to articles of indispensable use, or those which long habit has rendered almost, if not altogether, necessary to the great body of the people. It is from such alone that copious revenue can be drawn. And with respect to them, it is clear that in the form of profit, to those who make successively an advance of the duty, the consumers pay much more than they would pay for the cost of collecting the same sum, by an internal tax, levied on the same articles at the moment of consumption. Let this cost then be extended, if gentlemen please, to ten or to fifteen per cent., still they will find that it is but light in comparison with the other. They will find, also, that those parts of the country most distant, and those which are least able to bear the public burdens, will pay far more than the wealthy and populous parts for collection of their quota. And it will perhaps command their particular attention, that inhabitants of the large cities will (in this mode of taxation) have a prodigious advantage over those at a distance. Finally, if it be objected that, for the internal taxes, we have hundreds of collectors appointed by the President, gentlemen must see that, for the duties, there are thousands of collectors, self-appointed. Let us not then be terrified by the idea of Executive patronage, for admitting it to be an evil, we shall find it to be unavoidable but by greater evil. The true question is (or ought to be) how the public necessities can be supplied with least inconvenience to the people.

There is another point of view, also, in which, on principles of sound policy, a preference is to be given to internal taxes. The collection of them keeps money in the country, whereas other taxes necessarily draw it away to the seaports, creating a distressful scarcity of cash in remote districts. Now there is nothing which tends so much to private economy as money dealing, for there is always more profusion where articles are procured on credit, than where they are paid for with cash. On the one hand, the consumer is more at the mercy of those who supply his wants; and, on the other, the trading part of the community is more exposed to loss from insolvency; and, as a result of both, the sum of national prosperity is diminished. It may be necessary perhaps to elucidate this position, and some others connected with it. Let us then take for an example the tax on distilled spirits; and to this effect let us suppose a district surrounding a large distillery, and trading with the manufacturer. The necessity of money to pay the tax will, by degrees, introduce money dealing between the distiller and the farmers. He will pay to these, in cash, for their grain, and they will purchase with cash the spirits they consume. Those not consumed will be sold by him, and the needful money be thereby obtained both to pay his tax and to support the commerce of the district. The farmer, having sold his grain, will purchase no more spirits than he wants, and will pursue his business so much the more steadily and cheerfully, as he finds for his produce a ready money market at his door. But if the tax be taken off and the former practice recur, so that the farmer must exchange his grain for spirit, he must either waste time in seeking a purchaser of the quantity he has beyond what he wants, or he must consume it himself. Taking the community in mass, there will happen a little of each, and the general result of both will be an excessive use of spirit, and a considerable waste of time, pernicious to individuals, and injurious to the State. I entreat gentlemen, then, to beware, lest mistaking the true interest of those they represent, like watermen who look one way and row another, they at each successive effort recede from the object they have in view. They contemplate a benefit to the interior country by this proposed repeal, which will produce a contrary effect. It will occasion great distress for the want of cash.

Internal Taxes.

SENATE.

I foresee that I shall (before I have done) fatigue the patience of the Senate, and shall therefore, omit many observations which I have yet to make on this head. I trust however that, as a general proposition, the advantage of internal taxes over duties on importation, so far as concerns articles of necessary or general consumption, is sufficiently evident. But there is one point particularly applicable to our system, which must not be wholly forgotten. A long credit for the duties is, in many cases, given by Government. Let it not be understood, that I object to this facility afforded to your merchants. I know it to be proper, necessary, and beneficial to the community; but there is a result from it, which will not perhaps meet with general approbation. So far as this duty goes, Government furnishes to the merchant a capital on which to trade; and on this capital the merchant derives a profit from the people. A profit by no means so great, indeed, as if he had been obliged to pay the duty in the first instance; still, however, it is clear, that high duties involve the necessity of a credit (equivalent to an advance) by Government to self-appointed collectors of the revenue, from which they benefit at the public expense. This surely is no recommendation of the system. Let it not be understood, however, that I object absolutely to a duty on imports. This would be running into another extreme, and extremes are seldom either reasonable, just, or safe. But I contend that duties should be moderate, with a view as well to economy in the collection, as to the danger of contraband. I contend, also, that when a large sum is to be raised by a tax on consumption, it cannot be otherwise collected than as an internal tax, either with certainty, or with economy. Let me also observe, in this place, (what I ought to have mentioned before,) that I must consider the system, such as it shall stand after the repeal now demanded, as the system of the present Administration. It is as much so as if the whole were now about to be enacted; and it will not do for gentlemen to say, these duties were imposed by our predecessors, or by this, that, or the other class, set, or sect. They might have had some pretext (though not indeed any good reason) for saying so, had they left things as they found them; but the moment they make a change, the whole of what remains is completely their own. The reason is evident, it is palpable. Every part is in their power, as well that which they take, as that which they leave. Their choice therefore decides.

I conclude here, sir, my observations on the first head, and proceed now to consider what reliance is to be made on the revenue, supposing no frauds to be committed. Before I go into the detail of particular calculations, I must pray to be indulged with the preliminary remark, that, during the late war, there has been an increased consumption of foreign articles, because the means of procuring them were increased. To show this, I must be permitted to observe, first, that (as a necessary consequence of the war) our merchants found a great demand for their ships, which, sailing under a neutral flag, enjoyed (though not without interruption) the rights of neutrality. Freights, therefore, being high, many ships were built, and the labor applied to ship-building and navigation advanced in price; secondly, from the same general cause, occasioning large demands for our produce, and particularly for provisions, a similar effect was produced on the labor employed in agriculture; and, thirdly, the dearth of labor in agriculture and navigation increased the price of that engaged in domestic manufactures. The profit therefore, to merchants, to manufacturers, to farmers, to labor of every kind, being great, each class of society was enabled to consume more of those foreign articles which were suited to its particular taste and inclinations. All this is evident, and requires no other proof than a reference to recent facts. But there is one circumstance which may not so immediately strike the eye of observation, and which is of leading importance to our present inquiry. This increase of means arose principally from abroad, and must cease with the change of exterior circumstances. Could it be wholly (or principally) attributed to an ameliorated condition of our interior circumstances and resources, it might be expected to continue, and continually to produce the same, or similar effects; but, depending on the war, with the war it must cease. This point may require elucidation. To bring it, therefore, distinctly within our mental view, let us select one imported and one exported article of general use. Let us, for the first, take cloth, and for the second, wheat. Six yards of cloth cost, in Europe, ninety-nine shillings sterling, to which may be added (for the proportion of packages) one shilling, making together one hundred shillings. To this is added in America, by law, as the probable expense and risk of transportation, ten per cent. An average taken, I believe, with sufficient accuracy and fairness, is ten shillings. The amount is one hundred and ten shillings. On which the duty is twelve and a half per cent., or thirteen shillings and ninepence. This brings the cost in a seaport to one hundred and twenty-three shillings and ninepence. If we add about ten per cent. for the merchant's profit, or eleven shillings and threepence, we have a total of one hundred and thirty-five shillings, or thirty dollars, being five dollars per yard, to which must be added about twenty per cent. to the retailer. Hence it appears that cloth, which costs in Europe sixteen shillings and sixpence sterling, will be retailed in America for about six dollars. When wheat is, in America, at one dollar and a half per bushel, three yards of cloth (costing eighteen dollars) will be paid for by twelve bushels of wheat; but when the price of wheat is only one dollar, the same cloth cannot be purchased with less than eighteen bushels: and, on the other hand, when wheat, in Europe, is at six shillings sterling per bushel, the manufacturer can, with three yards of cloth, purchase more than eight bushels, but when the price rises to ten shillings, he cannot, with the same quantity of cloth, procure quite five bushels. Thus, on the interchange of the same specific articles, under the different circumstances of peace and war, the American farmer (in the latter predicament) saves six bushels on eighteen, and the European manufacturer loses more than three bushels out of eight.

Proceeding on this simple ground, we shall be enabled to take a more general view of the subject with equal perspicuity. To this effect, assuming cloth and wheat as representatives of our consumption and produce, let us suppose twenty bushels of wheat to be the average of our total export, and three yards of cloth to be the average of our total consumption of articles imported. If, on these assumptions, we consider the price of cloth to be about the same, both in peace and war, namely sixteen shillings and sixpence in Europe, and six dollars in America, and if we consider the peace price of wheat to be, in America, one dollar, and, in Europe, six shillings per bushel, and finally, if we consider the war price of wheat to be, in America, one and a half dollars, and, in Europe, we have these results:

1. As to America. In peace, twenty bushels of wheat sold at one dollar each, gives twenty dollars, and three yards of cloth purchased at six dollars per yard, cost eighteen dollars; leaving a balance gained to the country of two dollars.

But, in war, the same twenty bushels sold at one and a half dollar each, give thirty dollars; and the same three yards purchased as before for eighteen dollars, leave a gain of twelve dollars.

The difference, therefore, between the war and peace prices leaves an advanced gain of ten dollars, equal to one-half the produce at the peace price. Such is the result as to the husbandry of America.

2. In Europe, we have, in peace, twenty bushels of wheat sold for six shillings per bushel, which produce one hundred and twenty shillings, and three yards of cloth purchased for fifty shillings; leaving a difference of seventy shillings; which, after deducting the gain by the American husbandry of two dollars, or nine shillings, leaves a final balance of sixty-one shillings to those concerned in commerce, for commissions, freight, insurance, &c.

But, in war, the same twenty bushels at ten shillings will produce two hundred shillings. From which, deducting, as before, for cloth purchased, fifty shillings, there remains a balance of one hundred and fifty shillings; and, taking from this the twelve dollars gained by the husbandry of America, or fifty-four shillings; there remains a final balance of ninety-six shillings to those concerned in commerce. But we have seen that this balance was in peace only sixty-one shillings. There is, therefore, in war, an increased gain to those concerned in commerce of thirty-five shillings.

Hence, then, it appears, that with the same produce, and the same demand for necessary consumption, the means of every order of our citizens have been greatly increased, by the contingencies of war, at the expense of foreign countries. Objections, I know, may be made to this conclusion, and instances may be adduced to support them; still, however, as a general proposition, it will appear to be true, and it is not contended for as an universal proposition. Adopting it, then, with all reasonable modification, let us now, sir, proceed to examine those statements of our commerce and revenue which the Secretary of the Treasury has laid before you. Among these I find a statement (in the table L,) of articles supposed to have been consumed annually during two distinct and successive periods; and, on this hypothetic ground, an estimate is made (according to an assumed rule of proportion) of the revenue to arise from the present duties for eight years to come. It appeared to me, sir, when I looked at the Secretary's report, that his mode of reasoning, (by supposition grounded on supposition,) however it might tend to elucidate propositions, could by no means serve as dialectic argument to arrive at truth. His conclusions may perhaps be just, but I cannot persuade myself that the ground on which they are raised is sufficiently solid.

In order to arrive at something more like certainty, I have endeavored, in the first place, to make estimates on facts, in so far as the documents he has transmitted would enable me. And I have taken the average annual consumption of articles and of duties payable on them, for the longest terms mentioned in the tables annexed to his report; because it appeared to me that the average of a long term was less likely to be affected by accidental circumstances than of a short one. I find, then, from the table marked A, that the amount of merchandise paying duty ad valorem for eleven years, is $287,728,492. And I find, from the table marked E, in which the articles are classed according to the rate of duties on them, that a value of $185,887,546 would, with the present duties, yield a gross sum of $24,351,054. It may be presumed, therefore, that $287,728,492, the value imported during eleven years, would have yielded $37,692,089. If this be right, we have an annual average of $16,157,135 value, paying a duty of - - - $3,426,553

By the table A, the quantity of foreign spirits, consumed in eleven years, amounts to 55,475,505 gallons; by the table F, that 42,942,322 gallons paid $12,227,719; we have, therefore, by the rules of proportion, annually, 5,043,227 gallons, and a duty of 1,436,047

The molasses, by the same table A, is 46,809,917 gallons, or annually 4-255,447, which, at five cents, give -	212,772
The wine, by table C, is for six years, 12,470,657 gallons, which, at the present rates, would have paid $4-374,743; this gives annually 2,078,443 gallons, and a duty of -	729,124
The tea, by table G, is, for eleven years, 28,548 pounds, which paid a duty of 4,190,184, being annually 2,545,504 pounds, and a duty of -	380,925
The coffee, by table A, for eleven years, is 73,827,542 pounds, being, annually, 6,711,595 pounds, at five cents, is	335,797
The sugar, by table A, is for eleven years, 391,653,372 pounds, being annually 35,604,852 pounds, at two cents and a half, is -	890,121
The salt, by table A, is for eleven years, 22,087,507 bushels, being annually 2,007,955 bushels, at twenty cents, is	401,591
The average of sundry articles in the table H, is for eleven years -	362,237
The average of the duty on tonnage and passports for the last three years of actual receipts, the accounts of which have been settled, is, by table I,	120,666
The gross amount is - - -	8,295,833
Deducting for collection three and eight-tenths per cent, or - -	315,241
There remains net - - -	$7,980,592

I have taken the expense of collection according to the table I, which gives the precise amount during ten years. This differs a little from the rate assumed in the table L, which, as you will see, sir, is $3 62 per $100. According to this table, the net annual amount for six years, is taken at 8,350,000, being 369,408 more than the average of eleven years just stated. I shall compare the various items of these two accounts when I come to consider the probabilities of future receipt.

I have in my hand a detailed examination of the various articles contained in the table H, so as to ascertain, respecting each article, the relation of the general average for eleven years, 1790 to 1800, inclusive, to the special average for six years, 1793 to 1798, inclusive. I shall not at present, however, call the attention of the Senate to this detail, their time is too precious; but on some of the items I must say a few words by-and-by.

It will be observed, sir, that the general average of the net amount of duties and tonnage, for the longest period which the documents in our possession will enable us to examine, is something short of $8,000,000. The Secretary has taken the net average of six years, 1792 to 1798, inclusive, at $8,350,000, as appears by the table L; between that and a preceding period, he concludes there will be a future advance to the amount of above a million annually. I remark, however, that in the gross amount of duties in the last column of that table, viz: - - - $8,663,000

There are sundry articles which I wholly omit. The first of these is an extra duty of ten per cent. on goods imported in foreign vessels, to which merchants will not, I believe, subject themselves without necessity; it is stated at - - - $113,000

And for the same reason I omit the next article, resting on the same ground, which is - - - 43,000

The next is a supposed deduction on drawbacks, which can have no existence when the drawbacks cease, and there is little probability that they will in future amount to anything worth notice. The sum stated under this head is - - - 86,000

These deductions, taken together, amount to - - - 242,000

So that the gross amount, when stripped of them, will be but - - - 8,421,000

Which differs from the gross amount of the general average I have already detailed, only - - - 125,167

Let me observe here that, although it may have been proper to insert these articles for the species of calculation contemplated by the Secretary, they are wholly foreign from my view of the subject; for the Senate will recollect that my object is to consider the probable amount of duties to be collected in future, supposing no fraud to be committed. To this effect I mean to set out from the existent state of things, and under each distinct head, consider the chance of increase and decrease; comparing, as I go along, what I shall call the general average; that, for eleven years, with the particular average, by which I mean, that for the six years, 1793 to 1798. And before I begin with this detail, it may not be improper to observe, in gross, that the difference above noted, of about $125,000, is not material. I had, indeed, taken, in another view, an estimate of the amount which I will not now detain the Senate to consider, but merely mention that it is somewhat less. On the whole, therefore, I feel myself justified in taking eight millions of dollars as a present ground on which to stand, in examining future probabilities.

The first article in the list is the duties ad valorem, which, like all the rest, except wine, is the average of eleven years, which amounts to - - - $3,426,553

Making a difference of - - - $116,447

On which I observe, in the first place, that this difference is nearly equal to that between our respective totals; so that those which exist between other items, nearly compensate each other. I must observe, in the second place, that many of the articles subject to this duty have been imported during the war, to supply other countries, and that for some of them the duty has not, from particular circumstances, been drawn back on exportation. I must, in the third place, observe, (recurring to the table A,) that, out of eleven years, the two of greatest import were the years 1796 and 1800; the year 1800 exceeds the general average above eight millions of dollars, and the year 1796 exceeds it above ten millions. In fine, the year 1796 exceeds the year 1800 two millions. It is therefore clear that this increased importation is not conclusive evidence of increased consumption; and therefore it should not be taken as an admitted point from which to deduce, by proportional estimate, the future probabilities.

Let me remind gentlemen, also, of the general principle already established; that a decrease of the means to purchase many articles of mere luxury, will, of course, diminish the consumption. And, let me add, that many such articles, on which the duty has already been paid, remain unsold. As to the rest, looking over the list which comes under this head, I see several, the importation of which will diminish from other causes.

There are various articles of glass ware, which pay twenty per cent. duty. We already have glass houses established, and if we do not now make this substance cheaper than it can be imported, the cause of that and of such other inabilities must be sought in the high price of labor. This price will fall. And let me here, sir, say a few words on that subject, because we are now entering a field, in many parts of which it must recur.

The high price of labor has a two-fold effect upon manufactures, to enhance the price. The laborer receives more wages, and he does less work. When in great demand, he dictates his own terms, and is more master than his employer, who is frequently obliged to overlook his negligence, lest reproof should drive him away. Enabled to subsist a week from the work of two days, he spends much time in debauchery; and when he returns is frequently incapable of performing his business. The high price of home manufactures, which results from these circumstances, operates inversely to decrease the quantity. The great demand keeps up the price of wages, and while wages are high and journeymen idle, they consume more and produce less than when, wages being low, they live in habits of industry and economy; they are also much less happy; and, however paradoxical it may seem, it is a truth vouched by experience that if they do not grow rich with low wages, they become with high wages miserably poor. While labor is so much in demand as it has lately been, the protecting duties, which many were inclined to rely on as the source of public prosperity, produce an effect contrary to that which was intended. The home manufactures are thereby diminished, and importations increased, of all which the consumer is the victim; but whenever circumstances shall, by lowering the price of labor, the price of produce, and the freight of ships, effect the radical cure of this evil, more hands will be engaged in manufacturing, because none but good husbandmen and good seamen will be employed in tillage and navigation. Add to this that a given number of manufacturers will perform more work, and thus the means of increase to our domestic manufactures being doubled, the proportion of our imports to our consumption must be reduced; so that, in many cases, notwithstanding an increased demand, there will be a diminished importation.

Let us, after this digression, return to the object we left. Not only the more high priced, such as flint glass paying 20 per cent., but window glass, which pays 15 per cent., will be manufactured in this country; for it will be noted that the difference, duty included, between the prime cost and the mercantile price of articles imported, which pay 20 per cent. will be about 45 per cent.; on those which pay 15 per cent. it will be about 39 per cent.; and on those which pay 12 per cent. it will be about 36 per cent. The importation to firearms, if it do not diminish, will hardly increase. Hats were made in America so well and so cheap, while we were British colonies, that it was thought proper to pass an act of Parliament, to lay restrictions on that business. The furs are in our country, and are carried thence to Europe; we have wool in abundance; the logwood is at our door. Can it then be supposed that the artists of Europe will long support their competition, when a hat which costs four dollars in Europe cannot be retailed here under six dollars? Copper, pewter, and tin manufactures are already made among us in great quantities. The importation of them will, I believe, diminish. Earthen and stoneware (at least those articles that come under that description) are so cumbersome that, even without a duty, they would be made at home; and it will not, I believe, be long before our industry shall embrace some of the finer sorts. Leather and manufactures of leather are at a price so great as cannot but excite surprise. Thirty years ago our manufactories of leather were in a flourishing condition. Neither the capital nor the skill are diminished. Our export of beef shows that our stock of hides has increased. Bark, also, we export, and the enterprising industry of our fishermen leaves no lack of oil. Why, then, should we be under the necessity of importing the coarser manufactures of leather? This can arise only from the common cause of so many other woes, the extravagant price of labor; a cause which soon must cease. Marble and stone will, I believe, be imported to very small amount. Stockings, mittens, and gloves, have long been made at home. What may be the future amount of those imported will depend, perhaps, on fashion. It will consist of the finer sorts. Paper hangings and cartridge paper can both be made at home; much of the former is consumed, and there can be no good reason why that consumption should not be supplied, in a great degree, without recurring to foreign shops. Glass bottles, anvils, hinges, hoes, and brushes, are among the coarse articles which must soon be exclusively made at home. Anchors and sail cloth will both be manufactured in America; not, perhaps, to great extent, still, however, the importation must diminish, even though our commerce should increase. American vessels will supply themselves with anchors, sails, and rigging, in Europe, on which at their return they pay no duty. The ropemakers, sailmakers, and riggers of the United States will feel the consequences; for which, however, there is no remedy but by taking off some of the duties. It may, perhaps, be objected that this practice has not hitherto prevailed. To which I reply, that, during the war, these articles being in great demand in the ports of belligerent Powers, and being contraband of war, so as not to be carried thither under a neutral flag, were dear. It was not, therefore, desirable for a ship to procure her outfit in such ports; but the peace will operate a total change in that respect. Linen and cotton manufactures are increasing daily, and when the price of produce diminishes, our fellow-citizens in the country must do more to clothe themselves, in proportion as their means of purchase from the store shall be curtailed. Our consumption of stationery will certainly increase; but whether the progress of our manufactures will be equal to that of the demand, depends on circumstances too minute for the present investigation. The last of these articles, which I shall notice, is gunpowder, the importation of which there is every reason to believe will daily diminish. Much of it was, I believe, during the war, exported in contraband, clandestinely, and, of course, without drawback.

Having thus gone through the tedious list of ad valorem articles, and noted such as seemed to require it, let us (before we proceed) look back and consider whether, under all circumstances, it be not highly probable that the duty on this class of articles will rather diminish than increase. I believe, sir, that if gentlemen have attended both to the general observations and the particular details, they must be convinced that, on the total, there will be a defalcation. This single article, however, amounts to near three millions and a half, out of eight millions. And it is on this article also that the increase appears to be the greatest from the first to the second period, which the Secretary has selected as the ground-work of his calculations, you will see, sir, by recurring to the table L, that the sums are as 25 to 35.

That which stands next in order is ardent spirits, the average duty on which is - $1,436,047
The particular average in the table L, is - - - - - 1,475,000

Making an increase beyond the general average of - - - - - 38,953

With respect to this article in particular, I wish gentlemen to apply the observations already made on the means of expense in the several classes of our citizens. We have seen that our average import is not less than five million gallons. By recurring to the table A, we shall find that this import has varied much. The year 1793, for instance, stands charged with 700,000 gallons less than the year 1790. The year 1799 is charged with above two million and a half gallons more than the preceding or subsequent year. In a word, the quantity of 1799, exceeds that of 1793, by near four million of gallons. I mention these things to show that we should not take the average import, even of eleven years, as indicating a consumption regularly equivalent. But it is a fact, of public notoriety, that the principal consumption of imported spirits is along the seacoast; and that it has been greatly increased by the advance in the price of labor during the war. The cause ceasing, the effect must cease, and as habits of industry and sobriety prevail, that source of revenue will dry up. If, however, we should be mistaken in our hope as to the public morals, there is a further reason why it would be imprudent to count on a million and a half of dollars from the importation of ardent spirits. When labor and produce fall in price, the domestic manufacture of that article must become more beneficial, and the consequent diminution of its price will necessarily exclude (at least among the poorer classes) the use of foreign spirits. The art of distilling is rendered every day more perfect. Already certain kinds of spirit are prepared which are preferred, even by the rich, as articles of luxury; and there can be little doubt but that in a few years this will become one of our exports. The internal duty which operated (though in a feeble degree) to preserve a balance between domestic and foreign spirits is, by the act now before us, to be repealed. This very act, therefore, will operate against that part of the revenue. I ask, then, Mr. President, whether, under all these circumstances, there be any reasonable hope that this branch of our revenue will increase? Is there even a slight probability that we shall continue to derive one million and a half of dollars from the importation of ardent spirits?

The next article on our list is molasses, the general average of which, during eleven years, has been - - - - - $212,772 leaving a difference of above twenty thousand dollars annually of decrease.
The particular average by table L, is - 191,000

You will observe, sir, by the table A, that the quantity of molasses imported has decreased since the year 1790. The consumption of that and the succeeding year was twelve million gallons. In the year 1799 and 1800, it was but seven million six hundred thousand, making a difference of four million, four hundred thousand, or two and twenty hundred thousand annually. By looking at the table B, we shall find that a great part of the molasses formerly imported was distilled into spirits; but this manufacture has gradually declined. In the year 1790, we find a consumption of 2,305,461 gallons of spirits distilled from molasses, and in the year 1791, 2,536,037.

SENATE.

MARCH, 1802.

Making for those years - - -	4,841,498
But the consumption in 1799 and 1800 is only - - -	1,889,864
	2,951,634

being a difference of near three millions.

We shall find that the consumption of molasses in kind has been about three million of gallons annually. I observe, then, in the first place, that though our importation may have been diminished, either by the difficulty of procuring that article in the country where it is produced, or the facility of obtaining one of more value, brown sugar, there is another cause of the same effect, namely, that spirits distilled from domestic materials have supplanted those distilled from molasses. We ought, therefore, to combine the import of spirits with that of molasses. And if this be done for the three years 1790 to 1792, and for the three years 1798 to 1800, we shall find by table A, that in the former period the spirits amounted to, gallons - - - 12,326,406
And the molasses to - - - 16,269,367

Making together - - -	28,595,773
But in the latter period, though the spirits are - - -	16,736,977
The molasses are but - - -	11,685,588

Making together only	28,422,565
	173,208

The two periods differ but little, yet that little shows a diminished consumption of the foreign article. This took place while the price of labor and that of grain were high, and while the duty on domestic spirits kept down the competition. I again ask, what hope is there that this part of our revenue will increase?

The next article is wine. The average of the duty for six years, 1795 to 1800, by the table C, is - - -	$729,124
And the average for six years, 1793 to 1798, by table L, is - - -	714,000
The difference is but - - -	15,124

By recurring to the table C, we shall find that from the year 1795 to the year 1800, the importation has declined; for the first three years it amounted to, gallons - - - 7,619,278
And in the last, to but - - - 4,851,379

------------------------------	-----------

Or, annually, above 850,000 gallons.

This diminution may, perhaps, arise from a change in the manners of those who consume that article; for it is, I believe, a fact that, among the wealthier order of citizens, the pleasures of the social board are not so often as in former times extended to the vicious excess of inebriation. Perhaps, also, the art of manufacturing wine among us, is better understood and more practised. Be that as it may, believing as I do that the means of sustaining the expenditure will be rather diminished than increased, I do not think we can count on any considerable advance in this part of our revenue.

The tea imported during eleven years was, we find by the table G, 28,000,548 pounds, which, at the present duties, would have yielded $4,190,184. This gives an average quantity of 2,545,504 pounds, paying annually - - - $380,925

The average quantity for the six years, 1793 to 1798, by the table L, is 2,175,694 pounds, supposed to pay a duty of $326,000. But this duty is calculated on an average rate taken on the whole quantity, which, applied to that particular part, is too high; if calculated on the actual kinds and quantities, it amounts only to - - - 314,514

Which, deducted from the former, leaves	66,411
---	---------------

Thus, the difference between the average duties for the whole period, and that selected by the Secretary, will be above $66,000. So great an apparent decrease requires examination. I have, therefore, divided the whole term of eleven years into three different periods, namely, the first three, the next five, and the last three years; and I have averaged the consumption of each particular kind of tea, not only for the whole term, but for each of those distinct periods. I find that, in the whole term, the average consumption of—

Bohea, is	1,858,558 lbs.,	paying $223,027 duty.
Souchong, is	272,988	" 40,136
Hyson, is	216,413	" 69,252

Thus, we find a regular though small increase in the consumption of Bohea tea; and an increase as regular, but more rapid, in the consumption of Souchong. That of Hyson seems to have fluctuated, still, however, the increase has been greater than that of Bohea. But it is the article of Green tea (other than Hyson) which has made the most rapid progress. We find it rising from forty-five thousand in the first period, to one hundred thousand in the second, and to five hundred thousand in the third, being nearly equal to one-fourth of the Bohea. In this article, we trace distinctly the effect of those increased means of consumption so often mentioned. They have, we see, extended over a great part of society the use of an article of expensive luxury. It is probable that, by the diminution of those means in future, the further extension will be limited; there can, however, be little doubt that the use of tea (generally speaking) must increase. If, therefore, this branch of the revenue should decay, it will not be from a defect of consumption.

The next article is Coffee, the average of which, during eleven years, is 6,711,595 pounds, paying, at five cents per pound. - $335,797

The average estimate for six years, by the table L, is 7,351,665 lbs., paying 867,000

Making a difference of - - 31,203

Before I notice this article in particular, I must take the opportunity to observe, in general, that (like other things the produce of the West Indies) the consumption has been much increased by the peculiar cheapness, arising from circumstances which have now ceased to exist. It is notorious, sir, that we have, during several years, been the place of entrepôt for these commodities, which have been brought hither to be afterwards distributed throughout Europe. Of course they have been cheaper than they can be in future. And it is further to be observed, that, for a year to come, very little will be brought to us, because the price will naturally rise in the places where they are produced, and fall in those where they are consumed, from the simple consideration that they may now, at small expense and risk, be transported from the one to the other. It must, from that circumstance, happen that the article of sugar, for instance, will be worth near as much, for export to London, in Jamaica as in New York. This being the case, merchants who have a stock on hand, will find their best market at home; and until that stock shall be consumed, will not seek a fresh supply from abroad. We may consider, therefore, the next year's revenue on these articles as little or nothing. It is true that the defalcation will not immediately be felt, because the bonds for preceding years falling due, part duties will be in a train of collection; so that advances and deficiencies being spread through a greater space of time will have a more equable effect. When I speak of the cheapness of these articles, I must not be misunderstood. I do not, in a national point of view, apply that term to the money price. Money is but the counters by which the commercial game is scored, or the figures by whose aid calculations of traffic are made. The real price is the quantity of labor or of produce required to procure the merchandise. And when it is an article of luxury, this further consideration enters into the price: What is the amount which, after the purchase of necessaries, may remain for the gratification of appetite? When labor is at half a dollar per day, or three dollars per week, and board at two dollars, there will remain weekly for clothing, &c., one dollar. But when labor is at one dollar per day, and board at three dollars per week, there will remain three dollars weekly. If, in the former case, one dollar be employed for clothing, washing, and other necessary expenses, and, in the second case, two dollars, there will still remain in this case one dollar for articles of luxury. And the same reasoning applies alike to produce and to labor. After this digression, let us return to the article: We find, sir, by looking at table A, that the consumption has been variable. The average of the three last years, 1798 to 1800, is 7,462,233 pounds, being 750,000 pounds more than the general average; but, in the three first years, 1790 to 1793, it was only 3,836,391 pounds, being 2,875,000 pounds less than the general average. Finally, we shall find the average of the three first and the three last years, taken together, to be near 5,650,000 pounds. Now, it is not, I think, probable, that the consumption of the country will, for some time to come, exceed that quantity. If so, the revenue from it ought not to be estimated above 287,500 pounds, instead of 415,800, the amount relied on by the Secretary; that is to say, an advance of three-sixteenths on 367,000, the amount of the duty by the table L, for the years 1793 to 1798, inclusive. I am the more strongly of this opinion, sir, because it is notorious that during the late war our export of coffee has been very great, and because, on looking at the table A, we find that, although our excess of import in the year 1795, was 14,674,726 lbs. Yet the next year there was an excess of export amounting to 5,526,269

Leaving for the excess of imports on those two years little more than nine million pounds.

The next article is sugar, our average consumption of which by the table A, is 35,604,852 pounds, and the duty at two and a half cents is $890,121. The average estimate of the table L, is 36,149,665 pounds, and the duty at the same rate is $903,000. The general observations on the last article will apply to this also. For the same reasons which have been adduced as to coffee, we must doubt the conclusions drawn from both the general and particular average of the consumption of sugar; and we shall find by inspecting the table that the years 1797 and 1800 stand charged with above one hundred million pounds. The year 1799 is alone charged with more than fifty-seven million. The years 1797 and 1799 amount, together, to 106,847,381; the years 1796 and 1798 amount to but 58,609,976. Finally, if we take the amount of the seven years, 1790 to 1796, we shall find the average to be 28,723,137. At the end of that period, as at the end of every other during the war, there must have been a considerable stock on hand; so that the average thus found will probably exceed the actual consumption. If on the one hand, it be assumed, that the increase of population will call for a greater quantity, we must, on the other hand, consider the probable decrease of our means to purchase; and making proper allowances both ways, we shall find, perhaps, that thirty million pounds of brown sugar, yielding at two and a half cents seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, is as much as can safely be relied on. The Secretary however estimates an advance of three sixteenths on nine million three thousand dollars, making one million and seventy-two thousand dollars, which implies an annual consumption of more than forty million pounds.

The last article, specified in the table L, is salt, the average consumption of which for eleven years, by the table A, is 2,007,955 bushels, yielding at twenty cents $401,591; the six years' average stated in the table L, is 2,210,942 bushels paying $442,000. The consumption of this article has certainly increased (a thing which was indeed expected) but this increase has not been, I believe, equal to the expectation. For the future it cannot advance even as it has done before, nor by any means in proportion to our population, because, in the first place, those who live beyond the mountains find a plentiful supply among themselves, cheaper than it can be imported; and because, in the next place, those who live on this side of the mountains will, as the country becomes more populous, require a smaller proportion of salt. Gentlemen may at first view think this proposition paradoxical, but let them consider that when the number of inhabitants in a given district is sufficiently large to consume fresh beef, during the warm season, so that the butcher can keep up a constant supply, less salted meat will be used. It is true that our export of beef, pork, and fish, will increase, but the revenue will not be benefited by that circumstance. On the whole I incline to think that this article will suffer no diminution, and it may perhaps be relied on for the expected amount.

We then come to sundries, as specified in the table H. The general average of eleven years by that table is a revenue of $362,237. The special average of table L, is but three hundred and fifty-two thousand.

I will not, sir, detain the Senate by a particular examination of all the articles in this table, although I have prepared notes for that purpose. Even as to those to which it may be proper to call their attention, I shall briefly state my idea of the future, without dwelling particularly on the reasons; for it is growing late, and I fear much that your patience will be exhausted.

Beer, ale, porter, and cider, yield on the general average $21,305; on the particular average $24,053; leaving $2,748.

We import no cider, and the decrease of the price of grain and of labor will probably enable our brewers (who have already brought their art to great perfection) to supply all our wants of beer, ale, and porter.

Cocoa yields, on the general average, $19,070; and on the particular average, $16,768; leaving $2,302.

As an article of luxury, the consumption will not much increase.

Candles paying two cents per pound, yield on the general average, $1,288; on the special average $2,309; leaving $1,021.

The imports of this article will probably cease, as we export the materials from which it is made, and the quantity will increase with that of salt beef.

Cheese, paying seven cents per pound, yields, on the general average, $12,089; and on the particular average, $15,652; leaving $3,563.

If, sir, we may judge by a great instance (of public notoriety) there can be little doubt but that our cheese-makers will largely supply our wants.

Soap at two cents per pound, yields on a general average, $9,348; and on the particular average, $5,654; leaving $3,664.

This also must decrease as well as the revenue from candles, and from the same cause, for we export fat, tar, and lixivial salts. But I cannot help observing, in this place, that the tax on soap and candles falls heavily on the poor in our large cities. They must consume these articles, which differ in that respect from ardent spirits, and even from coffee, bohea tea, and brown sugar. Let it not however be understood, sir, that in anything I have said, or anything I shall say, it is in the remotest degree my intention to call for a comparison between different articles on which the weight of taxation may fall. The members of the other House, being more immediately representatives of the people, are perhaps better acquainted than we are with the wishes and feelings of our constituents; and whatever may be my private opinions, I shall (from deference to them) presume that they have consulted those feelings and wishes. These indeed ought to be consulted, for it is of consequence that the public burdens be borne not only with ease, but with satisfaction. I do not say that where the people wish for anything which I believe to be pernicious that I would grant it, even in compliance with the will of their immediate representatives. No, sir, it is our duty in such cases to oppose firmly our reason to their will. We owe ourselves to the public—we owe our time, our labor, and our lives. Nay we have a heavier debt. We owe it to the people to incur their displeasure for the promotion of their good. Neither the love of their applause, nor the fear of their censure, should lead us to swerve for a moment from the straight path which is pointed out by reason and duty. Under these impressions of what we owe to the other House, to those whom they represent, and to ourselves, I shall confine myself to the expression of regret, that more attention was not paid to the necessities of the poor who dwell in our cities. They form indeed but a small part of the community; but while we are so busy in taking off the taxes which fall on useless or pernicious expense, through the vast extent of our territory, I wish there had been some sentiment of commiseration for those who pay more than twenty per cent. advance on articles so necessary as soap and candles.

Tobacco is the next article which I shall notice. At ten cents per pound it yielded on the general average, $4,899; on the particular average, $2,962; leaving $1,937.

The greater part of what we have imported came, I presume, in the shape of Havana cigars; and that port being now shut against us, the importation will probably diminish, if it does not wholly cease. The sooner the better.

The general average of loaf sugar at nine cents per pound, is $7,847, and the particular average is $3,720; leaving $4,127. This shows a diminution of more than one-half, but if we examine the table H, we shall find that the average import of the three years, 1790 to 1792, was 208,540 pounds; that of the six years, 1793 to 1798, was but 41,337 pounds; and that of the two years, 1798 and 1800, only 11,711 pounds.

If the internal duty on this article be taken off, there can be no doubt but the regular importation must cease, and of course the duty.

Cotton has, I find, yielded, by a duty of three cents per pound, on a general average, $17,406, and on the particular average, $29,805; leaving $12,459.

As this article forms one of our principal exports, I cannot suppose that much will be imported. The greater part of what has been collected on it, has, I presume, arisen from the circumstance that it was not an exportation entitled to drawbacks.

Nails and spikes have yielded at two cents per pound, on a general average, $60,788, and on the particular average only $50,116; leaving $10,672.

These are among the principal articles of the table H. I shall dismiss them with a single observation. As a large quantity is made in America, notwithstanding the high price of labor, when the price of labor falls that quantity must increase. The duty is at least twenty per cent. and the packages, freight, and transportation, are great compared with the value. Importations must therefore decline, notwithstanding an increased demand.

Hemp is the next and most considerable article of this table; it amounts, by the general average, at a duty of twenty dollars per ton, to $63,847, and by the particular average to $70,434; leaving $6,587.

In addition to what has already been said, when anchors, sails, and sail-cloth, were under consideration, (which I shall certainly be excused from repeating,) it will be recollected that this is an article of American produce. Much labor being required in preparing it for market, the culture is necessarily limited by the hands to be procured, and the expense attending them. It must also be recollected that, in remote districts, as the price of grain declines, hemp and flax will be cultivated, because they can better bear the cost of transportation. From all these reasons it is evident, that this source of revenue must dry up in no distant period. The duties on hemp, nails and spikes, form one-third the amount contained in table H.

Cables and tarred cordage, paying a duty of thirty-six dollars per ton, yielded by the general average $15,681, and by the particular average $14,545; leaving $1,137.

I will not repeat what I have this instant said about hemp, but I will add, that while, by this duty, we mean to encourage the domestic manufactures at the expense of our navigation, we, by the duty on hemp, discourage the manufacture, but still at the expense of our navigation. Giving thus to agriculture and manufactures such advantages over navigation, we must not be surprised if those concerned in it redress themselves by fitting their vessels in foreign ports. I will not dwell on this subject, but simply remind the Senate that it is no light or trivial matter so to apportion taxes, as to conciliate the jarring interests of society, and produce the greatest possible sum of public prosperity. It requires much cool thought and calm reflection. It is not to be expected from sudden measures, hastily dictated by partial views.

The articles of twine and packthread, produced by the general average $6,256, and by the particular average $5,860, leaving $396, are only mentioned for the purpose of observing, that with a duty of nearly four cents per pound, on an article of such trifling value, there can be no doubt but that our demand will soon be supplied by domestic manufacture.

I shall say nothing of the duty on coal, except that in so far as it is an article of domestic use, the duty falls heavily on consumers, exclusively to be found in large cities; and that, in so far as it is employed in manufactures, the duty is a discouragement of what the Legislature wished to promote. The amount (either thirteen thousand or nine thousand dollars, according to the different periods) is by no means sufficient to counterbalance the disadvantages which result from it. Much coal is used in the coarse manufactures of iron, and it is these, which (of all others) we ought specially to encourage. As there is nothing more generally felt than the high price of iron wares, so it has ever been the object of wise Governments to reduce that price, by every just mode not inconsistent with greater interests.

The duty on shoes, at fifteen cents per pair, produced about twelve thousand dollars annually, and I find by the table a regular increase of importation, the duty notwithstanding—leather shoes, within a dozen years past, have risen to nearly the double of their former price. Fifteen years ago, they were made in this country as cheap according to the quality, as in Europe; but now, with a duty near fifteen per cent. on the real value, importations have increased. Here again we find the ill effects flowing from a high price of labor. They have probably caused this protecting duty to impede the progress it was intended to promote. But from the moment that a fall in price or diminution of the demand (compared with the supply) shall introduce, among our workmen, those habits of industry and economy which high prices have banished, the importation must cease; and unless I am greatly mistaken this period is not remote. I have now, sir, gone through the tedious detail of all these articles. There remains only the duty on tonnage and passports, which I have taken at $118,723, and the Secretary of your Treasury at $108,000, making a difference of about 10,000 less than my estimate. As our shipping (much of which has been employed in carrying on the commerce of other nations) will now lose that business, and of course be confined to our own, it will exclude, in a great measure, all foreign bottoms. If so, the foreign tonnage duty must decrease, and our own navigation will, I apprehend, be for some time to come rather stationary. I cannot, therefore, suppose there will be any advance in this branch of our revenue.

And now, I pray gentlemen to look back and consider the various items of the account we have gone over. Will they not be convinced that, if some few articles should remain as they are, or even if one or two of them should increase, yet many others must inevitably decline, and that all the change to be expected from our growing population, will be counteracted, in a great degree, by the decrease of means to purchase foreign luxuries, and still more by the increasing resources and productions of our domestic skill and industry? Can we, I ask, expect that the duties will rise from eight millions to nine and a half? Can we expect that they will long continue even at eight millions? I know, sir, that the deficiency will not immediately be felt. Our Treasury is full. Large sums are still due for the late abundant harvest of revenue. These will supply the ensuing want, so that one or two years may elapse before we awake from the dream of fallacious prosperity. We shall not the less, however, experience a serious diminution of the public income. This event must happen, even if these duties, on which we so vainly rely, should all be regularly and honestly paid; but will that be the case?

This leads me, sir, to the third point with which I proposed to trouble you, and I proceed to consider how far the practice of smuggling may endanger a revenue dependent on high duties. I shall perhaps be told that the merchants of America disdain the vile practice of smuggling, and that no danger on that ground is to be apprehended. I believe, sir, that I duly appreciate, and I am sure that I greatly respect the honor and integrity of our merchants. Much I know is due to their patriotism, much to their regard for the Government under which they live, something perhaps to their friendly sentiments for those by whom it was administered; but the commerce of America is not exclusively in the hands of Americans. I know not of any law to prevent foreigners from settling among us and engaging in trade. What common interest, what common feeling have they with our fellow-citizens? By what principle are they bound to support the credit, maintain the honor, or advance the dignity of our Government? What is it to them that our revenue should fail? Why should they wish to strengthen systems under which they neither expect nor wish to live? In coming hither they seek gain, and, if successful, carry the honey they have collected to their own hive. Men of this sort, leaving their homes in pursuit of profit, easily find out the left-handed road to fortune. If money is to be got by smuggling, they will smuggle; and the practice once begun, will extend itself, and must at last become general. I say it must. The fair trader cannot exist, when driven to a competition with the dealer in contraband. Imagine to yourself a merchant with a store full of goods which he cannot sell but on ruinous terms, and who sees in his neighbor a rival prosperous by illicit means; will such a merchant, when bankruptcy stares him in the face, when the wife of his bosom and the children to whom he is a father look up to him in vain for bread, will he refuse to follow the pernicious example? Can he resist? No, it is not in nature. These strong feelings of the heart will hurry him away. Bind him as you may by oaths and vows, he will, he must break them. He cannot tear from his bosom all the charities of life. It is possible that, in spite of temptation, and with the certainty of ruin, some few instances should remain of unbending principle; but the great mass will undoubtedly fall. The only question then for a legislator is how far the practice will be profitable, or, in other words, what is the proportion between the benefit and the risk.

It has happened to me, sir, in travelling along the coast of Flanders, to learn (both at Dunkirk and Ostend) some facts which may throw light on this inquiry. I select one as the most apposite. Before the commutation act was passed in England, the smuggling of tea in that kingdom was brought to so regular a system that, for a fixed premium of twenty per cent. on the valued invoice, smugglers undertook to deliver specific chests of hyson tea at any place named in the city of London; and failing in the delivery they paid the amount. I have chosen this article, because (the bulk compared with the value) it furnishes a standard tolerably accurate for the average rate of merchandise. The next point is to consider the dangers to be encountered or eluded. The coast of England is stormy and of difficult access. In one season of the year, the approach is dangerous from physical causes, in other seasons there is great risk of discovery, by the numerous cruisers and revenue cutters. In either case, when the goods are landed, new dangers arise, from a host of excise officers, who have a right to examine every package. The country, moreover, is open and highly cultivated; so that the means of concealment are unfrequent. Compare these circumstances with those of our own country. Without noticing the unlimited means of illicit trade in possession of small fishing vessels to the eastward, a single glance at our coast from Cape Hatteras to Cape Cod, is sufficient to show the superior facility of approach. Along the coast, from the beginning of May to the middle of August, vessels may ride at anchor in perfect safety. Innumerable inlets offer to the smuggler a safe retreat. Already flat-bottomed vessels ply between some parts of this country and the West Indies. These can run into water too shoal for your revenue cutters, even if they were sufficiently numerous to interrupt illicit trade; but did they like the fleets of Britain cover (as it were) the ocean, still they could not interrupt the adventurers; and when smuggling vessels once enter the inlets, should revenue officers attempt a seizure they will be resisted. The people in the neighborhood, deriving advantage from a concern in that business, will join in resisting. Will you quell them? Where I ask, is your military force? You have none! And if you had, what would it avail you? Look again at that extensive coast, see it clothed with vast forests of pine, which, proud of their sterility, bid defiance to the hand of cultivation. See those impenetrable morasses, whose paths are known only to those who inhabit them, and which are intersected by deep creeks with endless variety. Send regular troops of imbodied militia into this region to enforce your revenue laws; they will meet there a race of men bred from infancy to the use of arms and subsisting in no small degree from the chase. Dangerous marksmen, they will support the wastefulness of savage war by the resources of civilized man. Where the practice of smuggling obtains, you have no means of preventing a breach of your laws, but by repealing them. Straining at too much you will lose all. You hastily throw off a small burden now, and you will soon be obliged to take one up which is far more heavy. In the meantime, this country of order, of peace, and happiness, will become the theatre of violence and confusion. The morals of our people, already impaired, will be wholly prostrated. Where all will end is not easy to conceive nor even to conjecture.

But these, it will be said, are illusions of fancy; let us see whether they be not the cool deductions of impartial reason. To this effect I shall beg leave slightly to notice those articles, which, from their bulk, their value, and the amount of duty, will fall properly within the province of the smuggler. Among those which pay twenty per cent. duty are steel springs, coach, and chariot glasses, looking glasses, and cut glass. Of articles paying fifteen per cent., there are plated ware, jewelry, buckles, buttons, clocks, watches, gold and silver lace, China ware, paste work, harness, pocket books, powder flasks, and sundry other articles of leather, raisins, prunes, spices, many cabinet wares, essences, perfumes, dentifrice, bonnets, hats, gloves, silk stockings, lace, ribbons, fans, and other articles of millinery. Finally, among the articles paying twelve and a half per cent., are whips and canes, cambrics, lawns, gauze, silks, chintzes, and muslins. Every gentleman who hears me, must perceive, that each article in this long list will pay for the expense and risk of smuggling. Nova Scotia, the Bahamas, the West India Islands, perhaps the Floridas, will be filled with them, and furnish a constant supply. Pursuing our former track, we come (after the articles paying a duty ad valorem) to ardent spirits. The duty, in a document I have before me, is stated to be seventy per cent., it certainly is above fifty per cent. The very lowest is twenty-five cents per gallon, which gives twenty-two dollars for a hogs-head of ninety gallons. It can be smuggled for half that sum. Suppose the expense of smuggling, like that of tea into England, were as high even as twenty per cent., there would still remain a profit of above thirty per cent. to the adventurer, can the fair trader meet him on the ground of competition?

The duty on wines, according to the same document, is for small claret in casks, St. Georgio, and other wines of the Western islands, except Teneriffe, one hundred and twenty-five per cent, but were it only half that amount it is more than sufficient—on the best Madeira it is fifty-eight dollars per pipe of one hundred gallons—and it is notorious that for a much smaller sum the duty may be evaded.

The duty on Bohea tea, from India, is twelve cents; it can be imported and sold to a profit for twenty-five to thirty cents; of course the duty amounts to full half the value. On other black teas it is eighteen cents, equal to about one-third the value. On Hyson, thirty-two cents, equal also to near a third; and, on other green, it is twenty cents, which is more than half. Thus, on teas in general, the duty is from one-third to one-half the value. Compare this with the duty in England, which was but one-third; see the consequence in that country, notwithstanding the most jealous care of a vigilant Government, with the peculiar advantage that all licit importation was by a single company and in a single port; then judge of the consequence in this country. It goes to a length you are not aware of. It must, in the end, deprive your merchants of their trade to China. The vessels fit for that commerce are too large for illicit trade, and I repeat it again, the fair trader cannot, where duties are so high, compete with the smuggler. The trade must be abandoned, and the profits of it go into foreign hands. In the Dutch, in the Danish islands, magazines will be filled with teas of inferior quality; your people will purchase them at a high price, the State will lose the revenue, the merchant will lose his business, and the citizen will be obliged to consume articles of inferior quality.

The duty on coffee and on brown sugar is near fifty per cent. These articles are produced in our neighborhood; they are usually brought in small vessels; there cannot be the slightest difficulty in the clandestine trade; it not only will, but it must, (nay, it is almost impossible that it should not,) take place: and, if refiners of loaf sugar are established in our neighborhood, that article also will find its way among us to the exclusion of our domestic manufacture, the repeal of the internal duty notwithstanding. There is one article, playing cards, with which we are already inundated from Canada; and the high price is sustained, although the revenue is defrauded.

Let gentlemen, then, look at the consequences. They complain of the number of officers employed in the collection of direct taxes, but it has been shown that a still greater number is employed in collecting the duties, and now it appears that a great addition must be made (even to that number) for the purpose of defrauding the Government, while they collect from the people large taxes, no one dollar of which is to enter the public Treasury. Gentlemen wish to favor the interior country at the expense of the seacoast, and their measures will render the interior tributary to the very worst of those who live along the shores of the ocean. Neither will the merchants who carry on an illicit trade derive from it all the advantage which the public lose. Look, I pray at your northern and southern frontiers; see upon the north the most commercial nation on earth; the nation which has most capital, and certainly not the least enterprise; they are separated from you by a long line of water communication, which invites to contraband. On this quarter you can have no means either of prevention or of detection. The merchants of Canada will supply with articles, highly dutied, the whole Western world. Nay, many such articles will, from the facility of communication in the United States, find their way from the St. Lawrence, to the head waters of the Carolinas and of Georgia. To the smugglers of Canada, then, will your citizens pay that tax which they wish to withhold from their own Government. Let it not be understood that I mean to cavil at the particular articles which the majority of the other House have selected. This, as I said before, I leave to them; nor shall my wishes lead either to objection or to complaint. But if, on the consumption of these articles, you persist in raising such large sums, it must be, in part, by an internal tax. Take a moderate share as duty; take what the trade will bear, and what the merchant can pay; take what will give no temptation to fraud; and take the remainder in the only way by which you can get it; take it in the way least burdensome to the people; take it in the way most equal and most just. Let the burden fall in due proportion upon all. Imitate the operations of nature. Let exhalations be drawn from an extended surface, and then fall back to the earth in prolific showers and refreshing dews.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, said he would not occupy much time, as he concluded every gentleman had made up his mind. He thought the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Ross, ought to vote for this repeal, if he would now oppose the first institution of internal taxes. Necessity was the only ground which could justify the imposition of taxes; and, at any time, when such necessity ceased to exist, it would be proper to abolish. If the people saw the Government disposed to lighten their burdens, they would cheerfully submit to taxes in future. He acknowledged it would be difficult to ascertain the result of things in respect to our revenue on commerce, but believed it would keep pace with our increase of population. Drawbacks would now cease, and all our imports would realize a revenue. Depredations had injured us during the European war; they would now cease. He acknowledged that the high prices of our produce increased our means of consumption, but thought gentlemen had not sufficiently attended to the corresponding high prices of foreign articles. Coffee, sugar, and West India produce, he thought, would fall, as much, or nearly as much, as our own produce. He said, gentlemen could better attend to the Secretary of the Treasury's calculations and statements at their lodgings, than here in debate, and believed it best to stick to the Secretary's report, rather than to calculations of anybody else. It was not important or relevant to prove what kind of taxes were best, it was enough that we could do without these, which were odious to the people, and many of them vexatious, such as the stamp duty, &c. As to smuggling, he did not think we were much in danger of it, unless the art should be learnt from the gentleman's (Mr. MORRIS'S) speech, who had proved that if it was not moral, it was at least venial to smuggle. The carriage tax, he thought, was unconstitutional. Gentlemen in opposition had triumphantly brought forward the appropriation, and the pledge of these taxes to pay the interest of foreign loans, and, in general, the interest and principal of our national debt; he considered this but a pledge, which we had good right to withdraw, if we had a sufficient sum of other funds pledged to answer all the demands. He considered the savings made already in our current expenses, would release a sufficiency of other funds, to stand in the place of the internal taxes, and justify us in abolishing them.

He thought gentlemen were too tenacious to keep in office their friends; he did not condemn the principle of respecting faithful officers who had left other business to serve the public, but he thought, in this instance, and in every instance this session, when an attempt was made to reduce the number of useless officers, that the opposition were more attentive to the good of those officers of their own creation, than they were to the good of the people, which seemed not to have much weight with them. Upon the whole, he had always considered these taxes as unwise, when laid, and oppressive in their operation; they were the darling child of the first Secretary of the Treasury, who had declared, that excises were forced upon the people in other countries, and that they should go down here. They were, he believed, very obnoxious to the people, who expected those whom their confidence had placed at the head of their affairs, should destroy them; and as he believed it could be done without hazarding our public faith, especially if we economized as we ought in our expenses, he should vote for the repeal.

Mr. TRACY.—Mr. President, I intended to offer my sentiments, upon this subject, more at large than my present strength will enable me to accomplish. But I regret this circumstance the less, since my honorable friend from New York, (Mr. MORRIS), in his able argument, which was yesterday offered to the Senate, has done so much justice to this important subject.

Without any knowledge of his calculations, I had adopted his mode of ascertaining that a defalcation of our impost and tonnage duties would be the unavoidable consequence of the present state of affairs in the United States and Europe.

I am strongly impressed, sir, with the idea that if gentlemen will permit themselves to give the calculations and arguments of my honorable friend a candid attention, the result will be a conviction of their force and importance; and that, as far as demonstration, upon such a subject, can be obtained, he has succeeded in demonstrating that our import and tonnage duties will decrease, and of course will not alone be sufficient to meet the public exigencies.

Permit me, however, to bring into view a few points in the same train of argument, which have either not been mentioned at all, or not urged so far, as their importance will justify.

The first question which will occur, when we contemplate the repeal of laws imposing taxes, is, can the public requisitions be met and satisfied without them? To answer this question with propriety, let us cast our eyes upon the expenditures, which are indispensable for eight years to come.

I assume the period of eight years, because within that time our Dutch debt will all fall due, and our eight per cent. stock, will become redeemable.

The statement will be as follows:

Interest and reimbursement of six per cent. stock	- - - - -	$26,802,896
Interest and reimbursement of Dutch debt	- - - - -	10,647,672
Interest on three per cent. stock	- - - - -	4,579,129
Interest on other loans, as per Treasury statement	- - - - -	5,395,414
Payment on bank loans	- - - - -	2,740,000
Payment of bank per cent. stock	- - - - -	6,480,000
Interest on $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. stock, not included in Treasury statement, for two years	- - - - -	203,225
Interest on $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. stock	- - - - -	13,534
Interest on navy stock, 5 years	- - - - -	213,510
Making in the whole a total of	- - - - -	57,075,580

Divide this total by eight and the sum will be found to be $7,134,447 50 cents, which, in each of the successive eight years, we must pay, to fulfil our public obligations. When I say must pay, it is strictly true in respect to all the above items, excepting the eight per cent. stock, but as that is on an interest so much higher than any other part of the public debt, I presume Government will feel an obligation sufficiently strong to pay it off as soon as it becomes redeemable.

To this sum of	- - - - -	$7,134,447 50
We must add as annual expense, civil list	- - - - -	780,000 00
Foreign intercourse	- - - - -	200,000 00
*Expenses of navy	- - - - -	900,000 00
Expenses of army	- - - - -	1,100,000 00
Making in the whole, a total annual expense of	- - - - -	10,114,447 50

* The current annual expenses are taken from the last and lowest estimates; if any increase in army or navy expenses should happen, these estimates will fall short.

for eight years to come. To which must be added the contingent expenses, which experience has taught us, must and will occur in the most peaceable times; such as expenses to carry into effect treaties, &c., &c., to the annual amount of one of or two millions at least. During this year, the French convention, and a recent one with Great Britain, have made a serious call upon our Treasury, and at all times the sum must be considerable, which prudence will dictate should be kept in the Treasury to satisfy contingencies.

For the payment of this annual sum of $10,114,447 50, with the probable contingencies, what are our means? If these internal taxes are abolished, we must resort to the sales of Western lands, produce of the Post Office, and dividends on bank shares, as the only aids of any amount to our imposts and tonnage revenue. And although I do not believe the sum of $400,000 a year can be expected from the sale of lands, for the reasons offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Ross,) and although it is doubtful to say no more of it, whether we shall not expend all the income of our Post Office in the extension of roads, and other incidents to the Post Office itself, yet I will take the sums calculated by the Secretary of the Treasury to arise from those sources.

Annual sales of lands	- - -	$400,000
Do: produce of Post Office	- - -	50,000
Dividend on bank shares	- - -	71,000
Making in the whole a total of	- - -	521,000

If this sum is deducted from our annual expenditure, it will leave $9,593,447 50, which must be paid by the duties on impost and tonnage, or not at all, together with all contingencies. Is it probable that the net produce of our revenues, arising from impost and tonnage will amount to the sum of $9,593,447 50, for each year, during the period of eight years? The answer to this question it must be acknowledged, cannot be mathematically accurate; but it is presumed, that a tolerably correct estimate may be made. Here, sir, I avail myself of the calculations and arguments of my honorable friend, (Mr. MORRIS.)

Consumption must form the basis of our revenue by imposts. And as I believe the maxim to be just, that for a given number of years, no people can consume more of foreign articles than they can pay for, the diminution of means, owing to the lower process of our own products, &c., must diminish consumption. The increase of population will certainly increase home manufactures; labor which has been turned to account, to aid our remittances for imported articles, will of course now be turned to manufacturing; and the very act of repealing the laws laying internal taxes, will lower the price of domestic spirits, loaf sugar, &c., and a resort will be had to them, at the expense of impost on similar imported articles. The six per cent. and other stock of this country, have been articles of remittance, which source must in a measure be dried up, if Europe shall remain in peace.

The article of imported salt, forms an important item in our table of impost. In the statement of the Secretary (marked O) there is stated to have been 2,734,243 bushels of foreign salt, imported into the United States, in the year 1800, upon which a duty of twenty-five cents per bushel was paid, amounting to $546,848 60. All this sum will very soon be taken from our impost, the people at the eastward, are now manufacturing sea-water into salt, with so little labor, and with such success, that I am convinced they can, in a very little time, afford it for less than the ordinary freight from the West Indies. I mention this article of salt, because it is at present an important article of impost, and because I verily believe it must soon cease to be productive; and particularly because I conclude the circumstances of its very successful manufacture, and the facility which with incalculable quantities can be made, have not obtained general notoriety. Can any man with a view of this state of facts, in addition to those mentioned by the gentleman from New York, believe that our impost can be as productive as it has been during the war in Europe? I think not. It is true, that for a year or perhaps eighteen months, the sum of receipts at the Treasury may not be sensibly diminished, by reason of the duties heretofore having been secured by bond and payable in future. But when we take into consideration the very heavy duties on coffee, tea, and brown sugar, which have only been supported by the favorable state of things, arising to this country from its neutrality, during an unparalleled war in Europe, can we be justified in supposing such duties can be supported in time of peace, and consumption suffer no diminution?

And if consumption suffers no diminution will not the revenue be diminished by smuggling articles into a country so favorable to smuggling; and on which the duties are so high as to offer a good premium for the risk? Especially when many articles are highly dutied, and are of great value and small bulk. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MASON) supposes that my honorable friend (Mr. MORRIS) has instructed the adventurers of this country in the art of smuggling; he may rely upon it, that the art is in good forwardness, and stands in no need of instruction; the allurements of high duties is too great not to be understood, especially when an extensive coast, unguarded in almost every part, invites to practice. When contemplating this subject, very many facts will crowd themselves upon the mind, tending to a conviction that our revenue by impost must decrease.

I forbear to mention the uncommon supply of dutiable articles on hand; the probability that mercantile enterprise has brought many goods into the country from the expectation of drawback, and from a variety of circumstances, exportation has taken place without the drawback; and many other events similar in their effects, because this Senate are under no necessity of information on such obvious points, and because they have been already urged in this debate, with great force and conclusiveness.

If it be objected, that the result of all this must leave the mind in doubt, and that demonstration is not yet obtained; I ask, if we ought to run the hazard of giving up our internal taxes, if the event is only doubtful? Under such circumstances, is a sober, cautious Legislature justified in taking a step like this?

We have tried the experiment of internal taxes; the obstacles of collection are all or nearly all surmounted; and the people, as far as my information reaches, are becoming reconciled to them; add to all this, it is at least doubtful, whether we can as yet dispense with them, with safety to our public faith. It is now a time of peace, and measures already by law adopted to pay off the national debt, can better now than at any other time, be enforced. I should believe we ought to extend the system of internal taxation, rather than abolish those taxes already established. At any rate, is it politic to adopt this repeal, before experiment shall have informed us what the state of our impost will be in time of peace? It has been said the national debt was an enormous evil, and that to pay it off the people would submit to almost any temporary burdens. When peace has visited the world, and we are in prosperous circumstances, when our internal revenue can better be increased than at any time, for many years past; when our expenses have been and are to be, we are told, lessened in every respect; why should we lose sight of an object so desirable as that of increasing the means of extinguishing the public debt, by calling forth all the energies of the nation, for replenishing our Treasury? Instead of this we are to repeal the system of internal taxation, trust our whole revenue to the winds and the sea, and every other casualty to which human affairs are exposed. The Secretary of the Treasury himself, does not calculate upon a greater sum than nine millions and a half for the annual product of the impost. I think it has been shown, that the amount will fall far short of the sum; but allowing that sum to be realized, still our means will fall short of the necessary expenditure, the sum of $93,447 52 annually. How are we to get along with such a deficit? and this too with no allowance for contingencies. The answer is plain, our debt must accumulate, or some of our necessary institutions must suffer. This suffering I fear will fall upon our navy, and leave our commerce literally to the winds. If we permit these taxes to remain, and experiment shows hereafter that we can do without them, the repeal can be had at any time; but once repeal them, and what is to be the result, if experiment shows we cannot do without them? Can they be revived? No man will pretend a revival to be practicable. Such a measure would shake its revivers from their seats in both Houses of Congress. After the people have once been told by a Legislative act, and that after an Executive recommendation, that the product of the internal taxes are not wanted, it will be a hard matter to convince them that a necessity exists for their revival. If they can ever be peaceably collected, it must be by resisting the unfounded opinion now, that they can safely be abandoned.

Internal Taxes.

SENATE.

Permit me now sir, to make a few observations upon the general subject of internal taxes. I know it has been said, that excises are odious to a free people, and that a part, at least, of those now to be abolished are peculiarly odious. In addition, it has been said, that the cost of collection is very great, and a useless number of Executive dependants are employed as excise officers. I believe all pecuniary impositions are, and always will be, unpopular; but making a reasonable allowance for that general disposition to part sparingly and reluctantly from our money, I believe that a free people can better pay a part of the support which they must afford to the Government, by way of excise, than to pay all by impost. And for this plain reason, because, they can pay by excise much cheaper or with less cost for collection, than by impost. To avoid all dispute on the cost of collecting our internal revenue, let it be set at fifteen per cent., or if you please at twenty. I ought to say here, that by a judicious extension of the objects of stamps, excise, &c., I have no doubt but our internal revenue could be collected for five per cent., probably for less.

But, say it cost fifteen or twenty per cent., does not our impost collection cost much more? The cost of collecting any tax is precisely that sum, which the people pay, more than the sum which is actually paid into the Treasury. Or, to make my position plainer: if one hundred and fifteen dollars are paid by those who use stamped paper, parchment, and vellum, in one year, and the expense paid to officers, &c., is fifteen dollars, then one hundred dollars is the net revenue, and fifteen dollars the cost of collection. Or, in other words, if one hundred dollars are paid by all those who ride in pleasure carriages for one year, and after deducting all expenses of collection eighty-five dollars are paid into the Treasury on account of that tax, then the cost of collection is fifteen per cent.

One thousand dollars worth of goods are imported, of the kind which are duties at ten per cent. ad valorem; the duties to be paid into the Treasury by the importer are one hundred dollars. The importer pays this sum, but, after deducting collector's fees, &c., the sum paid into the Treasury upon these goods, is but ninety-five dollars. Then the public have received on one thousand dollars, ninety-four dollars. Let us see how much the consumer of these goods pays for collecting the duty. The importer has paid one hundred dollars, on this sum he puts his profit, when he sells the goods, say twenty per cent., that will make the addition for the consumer to pay, and it is easily discerned, that the sum will be one hundred and twenty dollars; the retailer (if there be but one more purchaser before the consumer, but in many instances there are two or three) puts on twenty-five per cent. when he sells to the consumer, which will be thirty dollars more; making in the whole one hundred and fifty dollars paid by the consumer, when the Treasury receives but ninety-five dollars. The difference between ninety-five dollars and one hundred and fifty dollars, amounting to fifty-five dollars, is the sum which the duties on one thousand dollars worth of imported goods costs for collection. When there are no duties, the consumer would receive this one thousand dollars worth of goods for one hundred and fifty dollars less, and all the merchants concerned would receive the same or a proportional profit. The public receives but ninety-five dollars, and for this consideration the consumer pays fifty-five dollars, which is certainly the cost of collection; and that is between fifty-seven and fifty-eight per cent. That those who live in the interior of the country pay more than those on the sea-coast, for collecting the impost, is obvious, from a well known fact, that the goods pass through more hands before they reach the consumer, all of whom will put on a profit.

If these statements are correct, is it not demonstrated that the imputation on excises, for the great cost of collection, is unfounded? In case of excise, the consumer pays but one officer for collection; in the case of impost, a great number must be paid. Are there four or five hundred officers of excise all of whom are checked by law? There are thousands of officers of impost, a great proportion of whom are under no legal restraint. It is fallacious to flatter ourselves that there are but fifty or sixty officers of impost whose fees are limited; there is a host of them, self-created and under no limitation. The question may readily occur, what then shall be done? The answer is easy, regulate your impost, let the duties be reasonable, to avoid smuggling, and so reasonable as not to prevent consumption; increase your excise in objects and sum, and let both proceed together, and a greater sum of revenue, than heretofore, can be raised, and with less oppression to the people. This was the system of those who have been in power, and it will force itself upon those in power, or they will be forced out. Unless your excise is kept in co-operation with your impost, the latter will become intolerable and inefficacious. Especially when an attempt is made to raise by it so great a sum as will be requisite for our national exigencies. That a dangerous Executive patronage is established by the appointment of excise officers, is to me an assertion so contrary to my knowledge of the facts, that I can scarcely believe it deserves a serious answer; but to preserve decorum in debate, my reply to that objection against internal taxes is, that so far as I am acquainted with the subject, the Executive has rather been weakened, by the appointment of those officers; and I can discern no prospect of a dangerous accumulation of power, from the appointment of excise officers, and before I will consent to remedy an evil, I must be convinced that an evil exists.

It is objected further against excises, that the system of espionage and oaths resulting from it, is destructive of the peace of society and of morals. Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate to hear a detail of facts upon these subjects; but I have searched the statutes respecting impost and excise, and believe if any man will do the same, it will be found that espionage and oaths are more dangerously produced by the former than the latter. The truth is, that Government implies force on the one part, and obedience on the other; and it is easy to discern in its most favorable operations that a clamor can be made against it, especially that necessary part which takes from the people money to support it. No system of taxation under heaven can be carried into effect, without coercing the immoral, and sometimes bearing hardly upon inability itself; suffice it to say, that excises are as unexceptionable in their nature as any mode, and for a country like ours, probably the most unexceptionable.

I hope no member of this Senate can be actuated in his vote upon this subject by any engagements to his constituents—that at all hazards the internal tax should be abolished. I cannot believe any member is under such engagements; if there should be any, I am confident that silence to him will be as efficient as argument. But we are told, the members of the Legislature are not at liberty to act themselves upon this occasion; that the Executive message at the commencement of the session has already, in effect, repealed the laws laying these taxes, and that a collection of them, after the people have been told by the President that they are not wanted, is impracticable. We are told further, that the same opinion is entertained in our financial department. As to the last, if a candid attention is given to the report of the Treasury Department, no recommendation to abolish the internal taxes can be found, but rather a contrary opinion seems to be indicated.

I acknowledge, and with regret, that the President has been unequivocal, and presume it will have great weight with the people, thinking, as I do, that the effects will be pernicious. I can but say, that the closet philosopher is more discernible in this recommendation than the politician. I accuse no man of acting upon this occasion with undue reference to popularity; if it be possible that such a motive could be indulged even for a moment, I am convinced that the time is at hand, when not a rock or mountain can be found in the sterile field of popularity, to hide such an one from the wrath of those very people whom now he thinks to flatter.

The time will arrive, and that speedily, when our public exigencies will require additional revenue. Can you rely on a land tax? Can you increase your impost? Can you reinstate the internal taxes? To all these interrogatories the answer is, no!

I hope I am mistaken in the consequences which I predict, as I sincerely wish this country may prosper in peace and quietness. Were I actuated by party motives only, I should rejoice at this measure. Let the internal taxes go, and you that abolish them, prepare to go with them, for "be ye also ready," is stamped upon the measure in characters too legible to be mistaken. This, it will be remarked, is spoken in reference to a firm belief, that we cannot support our public faith if we abolish these taxes. But, sir, I hope and believe my motives are above all party considerations. How long I am to continue in life I know not. I am admonished by ill health of its frailty; but, sir, I am fully convinced of the fatal tendency of this repeal to the happiness of this rising country; therefore it is, that I oppose it, regardless of any popular, unfounded opinions, which may seem to militate against excises or internal taxes.

The solemnity of the pledge which has been made of these taxes, by the laws originating them, is worthy of observation. They have been pledged for the redemption of the public debt, and every creditor of the United States has an interest in the pledge, which cannot be trifled with. The gentlemen who favor the repeal say, that although true it is, these taxes were pledged, yet we have a redundancy of funds which are likewise pledged, and therefore to withdraw the internal taxes can be no breach of faith.

I am free to acknowledge, Mr. President, that our funds can be in such a condition; for instance, should we proceed successfully for eight years in extinguishing principal as well as interest of our debt, there would then remain no Dutch debt, and a large portion of the principal of our domestic debt would be paid; in such case to say no funds however redundant could, consistently with good faith, be released, because originally pledged till the whole debt was paid, would in my mind be unreasonable. But if my calculations are correct, or anywhere near it, we have no right to presume on a present redundancy of funds, and the obligation contained in the appropriation of these internal taxes, recurs with all its force and solemnity against the repeal. When we take a view of the state of Europe, still agitated, though tending to a state of quietude; the condition of the West Indies, and the condition, as it speedily will be, of Louisiana; when all calculations of revenue from impost are so uncertain as to amount, and the expenses which await us still more uncertain; especially when we look at the Barbary Powers, I ask gentlemen not to give away a source of revenue already productive, and which may be easily made more productive, and not to run the hazard of violating our public faith, when a few years, perhaps a few months, may place us in a situation where certainty may be obtained.

The tax upon pleasure carriages, upon loaf sugar, and that of stamps, are so beneficial to the public, and fall so lightly, if at all, upon the laboring and poorer classes of people, that I should reluctantly give them up; and I am strongly impressed with the idea, that the tax on domestic distilled spirits and stills, is calculated to promote morality, as well as to raise a revenue. In a word, sir, I believe policy and national faith unite in rejecting the repeal.

Mr. JACKSON, of Georgia, said he considered the internal taxes as impolitic and iniquitous when laid; the New England States paid no excise on their orchards, as cider was not taxed; but all the orchards at the southward were, which consisted chiefly of peaches; this was unequal, and of this the people at the southward complained. He believed the recommendation of the virtuous Jefferson was sufficient authority to act upon in repealing those laws. Besides, the savings we had made already, in the reduction of the army, would amount to a greater sum than the whole amount of the internal taxes. [Here Mr. Jackson turned to the estimates of the army expenditure for 1801, and stated that more than $900,000 was saved by that alone.] The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. TRACY) has asked us, said Mr. J., where can we resort for taxes if we should be mistaken; and by this repeal there should be a deficit of revenue? I can tell the gentleman we can tax stock of all kinds, bank stock, and all other stock. I see not why great estates, made in a moment by speculation, should not bear a part of the public burdens, the holders are now like drone bees, sucking honey out of the hive, and affording no aid in its procurement. This is my opinion, and I care not who knows it.

Mr. TRACY said he could inform the honorable gentleman from Georgia, that the New England orchards were taxed, as great quantities of cider were annually distilled into brandy, so that the inequality suggested by the gentleman was ideal, and not founded in fact. He said further; he had expected, if the internal taxes were abolished, that the same principle which had done this, would lead the gentleman to tax the funds, as this would be a certain and easy way to pay off the public debt. But he acknowledged, after all the professions of those in power, to treat public credit in a cautious and sacred manner, he did not expect, so soon, an avowal of those principles.

Mr. DAYTON, of New Jersey, said he was astonished that such assertions were made to the Senate, as fell from the honorable gentleman last up, (Mr. JACKSON,) respecting the savings by the late reductions of the army. The utmost that could be pretended, was not more than $200,000, he believed not $100,000. The Secretary of War had said, in a very definite manner, that the saving might be $500,000, more or less; but when an estimate is made for an establishment, an army for instance, the army is supposed to be full; and an allowance is also made for losses and contingencies; every gentleman in the Senate knew that the actual expense paid for our army in 1801, would exceed but a little, the annual sum which must be expended this year? What have we done? said Mr. D.; a few soldiers and a very few officers have been dismissed, and it is mocking to the public and deceiving ourselves, to pretend such great savings have been made by this reduction of the army.

Mr. ROSS was sensible, the more this subject was examined the more reason would be discovered for gentlemen who favored the repeal, to retract their opinions. There was an express engagement, under all the solemnities of a law of the Government, that the taxes on stills and domestic distilled spirits, should forever be appropriated, while a debt existed, to the payment of that debt and the interest upon it; and that there should be no power to repeal this pledge without substituting other adequate funds to those removed. This is represented in all the successive laws on this subject, which places the obligation in a more striking point of view. Now gentlemen say we will repeal the whole at one stroke, and substitute what? Nothing.

The Government have received loan after loan, and repeated promise after promise; yet, upon the spur of the occasion, they retract all their promises, or repeal the laws which contain them; and seem to suppose such conduct will have no influence on public credit. What would, he asked, be the case of an individual who thus trifled with his creditors? What will our creditors at home think, and especially creditors abroad? This debate is in the presence of foreign Ministers, and the declaration goes forth to the world, that the Government of the United States will revoke its promises, however solemnly made, ad libitum; and this, because new men have come into power, who say, We have money sufficient to pay our debts, and what signify pledges! We did not make them; let those who made them look to them. No, sir, said Mr. R., our credit is gone if this bill passes; no man will trust you again; you may withdraw future pledges as well as these; and I would not trust a cent to the engagement of such a Government. The present majority have gone on repealing, till we have almost nothing left to repeal. These duties are solemnly pledged, and if you can abolish them, without a substitute, I repeat it, your national faith is violated, it is gone, it is not worth a cent. A gentleman, high in point of ability and standing in his representative capacity, (Mr. JACKSON,) tells the Senate that the public creditor may be taxed. [Here Mr. J. said it was a sentiment of his own, and he repeated it.]

Mr. R. said, let us examine it; instead of paying the money you borrow, you tax your creditor a given sum annually, till it is all swept off, and call this a payment of debts, and sacred preservation of public faith. He said he did not own any stock of any kind, and believed he never should, in this situation of public affairs; therefore, he was interested only to establish public credit for the benefits it would afford to Government itself.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Tennessee, said he could not conceive why gentlemen should lay such stress upon appropriations, inasmuch as our other funds were sufficient to make good all our engagements.

Mr. MORRIS.—Mr. President, the gentleman last up has brought forward in full, and the honorable member from Virginia, (Mr. MASON,) in part, a very extraordinary argument. And yet the gentleman from Tennessee expresses his surprise that we do not at once perceive the force of it, and agree with him that our faith pledged remains inviolate, because a reduction of $650,000 in our revenue is fully equalized by a similar reduction in our expenses. Let this argument be examined in each of its parts. First, he has assumed that $650,000 at least are saved by the reduction of the Military Establishment? But in what is that saving? In paper there is no real saving to that amount, or to anything like it. The gentlemen must find themselves hard pressed indeed when they are obliged to recur to the establishment voted, as the expense incurred, knowing as they do that there is a wide difference.

SENATE.

Internal Taxes.

MARCH, 1802.

They know that the army voted was not raised. They know the establishment was never complete. They know we have almost as many soldiers in our service now as we had before, and that all their boasted economy resolves itself into the dismissal of a few officers. The second point of this curious argument shall not be disputed. We readily admit the internal revenue to be full $650,000. But now for the conclusion from these premises: We justify repealing a tax we had promised not to repeal, because we make a saving to the same amount. We had reserved to ourselves the right of repeal, on condition that we should lay an equivalent tax; and a vote to save money comes to the same thing as a tax. Does it, indeed? Do you suppose your creditors will be the dupes of this new-fangled logic? When you took your engagements with them, was there any stipulation that you should be released from it, provided you should make a vote of saving. Was it not always understood that your expenses should be reduced as far and as fast as circumstances would permit, and that your whole surplus revenue should be applied to the payment of your debts? Have you not absolutely mortgaged that surplus to this effect? And can you release yourselves by a vote of saving?

The honorable member from Tennessee went on to express his surprise, that, not liking this plan, we do not come forward to propose amendments. And what have we to do with it? These gentlemen have charged themselves with the conduct of our affairs. They do not deign to ask our opinion on the measures they mean to pursue. Supported by a powerful majority, they do just what they please; and when they have brought forward bad plans, why then forsooth they ask us to mend them. But how mend them? We say that to ameliorate the system of our revenue the duties ought to be lowered; and that you should raise sums equivalent to the reduction by internal taxes. The gentlemen tell us they will have no internal taxes. This is their plan, and they call on us to mend it.

I have noted several things which were said by the gentleman from Virginia, but I will not trespass on the patience of this Senate by a particular reply. Indeed I do not conceive it to be necessary. The whole scope of his argument, like that of his friend from Tennessee, resolves itself into a reliance on the opinions and calculations furnished by the Secretary of our finances. The gentleman from Virginia has told us, that they are better fitted for consideration in our closets, than for debate on this floor. Be it so. He finds it difficult to follow, in argument, statements which vary from or contravert what the Secretary has advanced. This may be the case. He tells us, we must stick to the report; that it has been long in our possession, and that gentlemen fully understand it. Perhaps they do. He says they have made up their minds on this subject. I suppose they have. In fine, he triumphantly read to us a section of the Secretary's report, from the first page, to prove that the Treasury has received from duties the year eighteen hundred and one, ten million and a half of dollars; and that, had things gone on in the same train, the duties payable this year would have amounted to eleven millions. Hence he infers that the estimate of nine millions and a half for some years to come is quite moderate. I will, sir, since it is insisted on, confine myself strictly to this same report. I pray gentlemen, then, to take the trouble of looking at the table (I,) and to follow me in a few observations, which shall be so clear and so simple as to avoid all difficulty.

They will be pleased in the first place to observe, that this table purports to be a "statement exhibiting the actual amount of duties which accrued on merchandise and tonnage, and of the actual payments for drawbacks on foreign merchandise, for bounties and allowances, and for expenses of collection during each of the years '1790 to 1799.'" They will particularly observe, that the word actual is printed in italics, so as to call our special attention to this table as containing a statement of facts in contradistinction to theory. An account of what actually happened, and not an estimate of future contingencies founded on hypothetical calculation.

Gentlemen will have the goodness to look towards the bottom of this table for the years 1797, 1798, and 1799. They will find that the amount of duties, was

In 1797	-	-	$12,866,984	69

And dividing by three we have 7,874,294 94 for the average net produce of duties, tonnage, and passports, during the last years of which you have a true account.

Now, sir, it will, I think, be acknowledged that in this calculation there is no difficulty. In this plain state of the fact there is nothing intricate.
This is one of the tables on which gentlemen have had time to meditate in their closets. It can be understood with the utmost ease. Here is no supposition, no rule of proportion, but mere addition and subtraction; and from this, which the Secretary has sent you as the thing to be relied on, as the actual state of your revenue, it appears that during the years 1797, 1798, and 1799 you did not receive four and twenty millions. Yesterday
I had the honor of stating at large to the Senate my reasons for believing that we could not safely consider this part of our revenue as yielding more than eight millions annually. The most favorable estimate I could make fell a little short of that sum. I explained also my reasons for believing, that it would not for some time to come increase;
and for apprehending that it might suffer no small diminution. The honorable gentleman from Virginia, however, tells you that my arguments and my calculations must be disregarded. Be it so. He bids you stick to the report of your Secretary. Agreed. He says you must ground your faith on the statements of that officer. Content. And when you examine that part of them which deals not in splendid conjecture but in sober fact, what is the result? It is, that your annual revenue was not quite seven millions eight hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars, during the three years of greatest consumption, which you have any actual account of; being full one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars short of that which I was willing to take as the existent amount. Let then what I have said go for nothing, and bring the argument to this short issue. Is there any good reason to believe that during eight years to come your duties on imports and tonnage will yield annually sixteen hundred thousand dollars more than in the years 1797, 1798, and 1799?
This may happen, sir, but I do not believe it.

Mr. NICHOLAS, of Virginia, said, he did not believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr.
Ross) thought the majority had any intention of sweeping off the public debt in any other way, than by bona fide payment. As to the pledge so much talked of, it was nothing more, in his opinion, than a declaration that there should always be funds in readiness sufficiently large to meet our engagements. The gentleman from Connecticut

(Mr. TRACY) had, he thought, placed this subject on a fair footing. He asked whether gentlemen meant to carry their principles so far as to tie up the hands of all future legislatures by every appropriation they made? He would add that since the pledge of the internal taxes, we had greatly increased our impost, and pledged that for the same purposes, of paying principal and interest of the public debt; would not this operate as an equitable release of these taxes? Mr. N. believed his own assertion was as good as that of another, and he supposed our revenue without these taxes would be amply sufficient for every national purpose, therefore he should vote for the repeal.

Mr. Ross said, he could not ascertain what was the general intention of gentlemen as to taxing the public debt, but one of the majority had openly declared his opinion in favor of it; and the journals would show that a gentleman who was not now a member of the Senate, but high in the confidence of the majority, (Mr. Chas. Pinckney,) when he was a member, laid upon the table a law authorizing the taxation of public stock; it was true it did not pass, and was probably not called up by the mover; but he left every one to decide on the appearance which these proceedings had, and if they did not put at hazard the security of our public creditors. Mr. R. said he would add one word as to the pledge. The laws passed in 1791, 1794, and 1795, in which the promise was solemnly made and repeated; and in 1798 the surplus of all our revenue, arising from impost, tonnage, and internal taxes, was pledged for the payment of our debts.

On the question, Shall this bill pass as amended? it was determined in the affirmative—years

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report from the Secretary of the Navy, being an estimate of the Marine Corps for the year 1801; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate considered the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act for the better security of public money and property in the hands of public officers and agents."

Ordered, That they be referred to Messrs. TRACY, NICHOLAS, and OGDEN, the committee who brought in the bill, to report thereon.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill for the relief of Theodosius Fowler.

Ordered, That this bill be postponed.

On motion, that it be

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Comptroller of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to obtain a continuance or continuances of the suit in favor of the United States against Theodosius Fowler, now pending before the circuit court, in and for the district of New York, until the session of said court which shall be first held after the next meeting of Congress: And in the meantime the accounting officers of the Treasury are directed to re-settle and state the accounts of the United States against Theodosius Fowler, upon his contract made with the Secretary of the Treasury, on — day of —, giving to said Fowler at least thirty days' notice of the time when he may attend, and produce such claims, vouchers, documents, and testimony, as he may choose; and after fully attending to said accounts, and the claims, &c., of said Fowler, they are directed to make report of their proceedings thereon to Congress, at their next session:

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration.

The motion made on the 9th instant, that the Secretary of State cause the journals of the General Convention which formed the Constitution of the United States to be printed, was further postponed.

The bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen,'" was read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill do pass with the following amendments:

Section 1, line 3, after the word "act," insert "and until the first day of January next."

Line 4, after the word "warrants," insert "heretofore."

Line 4, after the word "or," insert "registers."

Line 5, strike out the word "by," and insert "agreeable to."

Line 10, after the word "the," in the second instance, strike out to the end of section, and insert as follows: "Same manner and under the same restrictions as might have been done before the first day of January last, provided that persons holding registers' certificates for a less quantity than one hundred acres may locate the same on such parts of fractional townships as shall, for that purpose, be divided by the Secretary of the Treasury into lots of fifty acres each."

Strike out 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th sections, and insert a new section.

"And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to receive claims to lands for military services, and claims for duplicates of warrants issued from his office, or from the land office of Virginia, or of plats and certificates of survey founded on such warrants, suggested to have been lost or destroyed, until the first day of January next, and no longer, and immediately thereafter to report the same to Congress, designating the numbers of claims of each description, with his opinion thereon."

The motion made yesterday, to amend the resolution under consideration on the 12th instant respecting the lands claimed by the United States within the State of Tennessee, was resumed, to wit: To insert, after the word "lands," in the second instance, these words: "to which the Indian claim is extinguished, and which is not covered by legal titles under the State of North Carolina."

And on the question, Will the Senate agree to this amendment? it passed in the negative—yeas 5, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Cocke, Nicholas, Tracy, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Colhoun, Dayton, Ellery, T. Foster, Dwight Foster, Franklin, Howard, Jackson, S. T. Mason, J. Mason, Ogden, Olcott, Stone, Sumter, Wells, and Wright.

On motion to adopt the resolution, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 2, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Colhoun, Dayton, Ellery, T. Foster, Dwight Foster, Franklin, Howard, Jackson, S. T. Mason, J. Mason, Nicholas, Ogden, Olcott, Stone, Sumter, Tracy, Wells, White, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson and Cocke.

So the resolution was agreed to.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill making provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill first mentioned in the message was read, and it was by unanimous consent read the second time.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. BALDWIN, BRECKENRIDGE, NICHOLAS, TRACY, and LOGAN, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act for the relief of sick and disabled seamen, and for other purposes,'" was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. BALDWIN, DWIGHT FOSTER, and TRACY, to consider and report thereon.

Ordered, That the consideration of the motion made on the 12th instant, relative to an amendment of the Constitution of the United States, be postponed until Monday next.

FRIDAY, April 16.

Mr. FRANKLIN, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 13th instant, the bill for the relief of Paul Coulon, reported it without amendment.

Ordered, That the consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow.

On motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, that it be Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as amendments to the Constitution of the United States:

That, after the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three, the choice of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States shall be made by dividing each State into a number of districts, equal to the number of Electors to be chosen in such State, and by the persons in each of those districts who shall have qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature of such State choosing one Elector, in the manner which the Legislature thereof shall prescribe:

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration until Monday next.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill to provide for the establishment of certain districts, and therein to amend an act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," and for other purposes; a bill to abolish the Board of Commissioners in the City of Washington, and to make provision for the repayment of loans made by the State of Maryland for the use of the city; a bill to regulate and fix the compensations of the officers of the Senate and House of Representatives; a bill for the relief of Fulwar Skipwith; and a bill for the relief of Lewis Tousard; in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills were read, and ordered severally to the second reading; and, by unanimous consent, the bill to regulate and fix the compensations of the officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. COCKE, DWIGHT FOSTER, and BRADLEY, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 13th instant, the bill for establishing the Government of the Territory of Columbia, reported amendments, which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The amendments reported to the bill, entitled "An act to alter and establish certain post roads," were considered and adopted, together with further amendments.

Ordered, That this bill pass to the third reading as amended.

By unanimous consent, the rule was dispensed with, and the bill for the relief of Lewis Tousard was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. BRECKENRIDGE, ANDERSON, and OGDEN, to consider and report thereon.

By unanimous consent, the bill to abolish the Board of Commissioners in the City of Washington, and to make provision for the repayment of loans made by the State of Maryland for the use of the city, was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. NICHOLAS, J. MASON, and WRIGHT, to consider and report thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT notified the Senate that, as the session was advancing to a close, agreeably to the practice heretofore adopted, he should withdraw himself from further attendance for the remainder of the session.

And on motion, the Senate adjourned until to-morrow.

SENATE.

Redemption of the Public Debt.

APRIL, 1802.

On the question, Shall this bill pass to the third reading? it was determined in the negative.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill to amend an act to establish the compensations of the officers employed in the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes; also, a bill making an appropriation for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and two; in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills were read, and severally passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the bill, entitled "An act to repeal in part the act, entitled 'An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes,'" be further postponed.

The bill, entitled "An act further to alter and establish certain post roads," was read the third time, and was further amended.

On motion to strike out the following words from the section last reported as an amendment, to wit:

"And it shall be, and it is hereby declared to be, the duty of drivers of all other carriages, in every reasonable case, to give way to the carriage conveying the mail; and if any person or persons owning or driving other carriages, shall use such marks or signals, or shall refuse to give the road to the carriage carrying the mail of the United States whenever the same may be practicable, such person or persons, so offending, shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding thirty dollars for every such offence, to be prosecuted for, and recovered, as in the foregoing section is pointed out."

It passed in the negative—yeas 7, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Breckenridge, Cocke, Dayton, Franklin, S. T. Mason, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bradley, Brown, Clinton, Ellery, T. Foster, Jackson, J. Mason, Morris, Nicholas, Ogden, Olcott, Stone, Sumter, Tracy, Wells, and White.

And having agreed to amend the title of the bill,

Resolved, That this bill pass as amended.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the committee, to whom was referred on the 17th instant, the bill for the relief of Fulwar Skipwith, reported it without amendment.

Mr. OLCOTT gave notice that he should, tomorrow, ask leave to bring in a bill fixing the time for the next meeting of Congress,

Mr. BROWN, from the committee to whom the subject was referred on the 7th instant, reported a bill to extend and continue in force the provisions of an act entitled "An act giving a right of pre-emption to certain persons who have contracted with John Cleves Symmes or his associates for lands lying between the Miami rivers in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, and for other purposes;" which bill was read, and ordered to the second reading.

And on motion, the Senate adjourned until tomorrow.

WEDNESDAY, April 21.

Mr. BROWN, from the committee appointed on the bill to extend and continue in force the provisions of an act, entitled "An act giving a right of pre-emption to certain persons who have contracted with John Cleves Symmes or his associates, for lands lying between the Miami rivers, in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, and for other purposes," reported an additional section to the said bill; which was read, and, together with the bill, was read the second time.

The bill making an appropriation for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and two, was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. ELLERY, CLINTON, and J. MASON, to consider and report thereon.

The bill to amend "An act to establish the compensations of the officers employed in the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. ELLERY, CLINTON, and WELLS, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. BRADLEY gave notice that he should, tomorrow, ask leave to bring in a bill to establish by law a more uniform manner of holding elections in each State for Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

Agreeably to notice given yesterday, Mr. OLCOTT had leave to bring in a bill fixing the time for the next meeting of Congress, which was read and ordered to the second reading.

The bill altering the sessions of the district court in the district of Vermont, and for other purposes, was read the third time. On the question, Shall this bill pass? it was determined in the negative.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill for the relief of Theodosius Fowler.

Ordered, That this bill pass to the third reading.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee to whom was referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act for the better security of public money and property in the hands of public officers and agents," reported that a conference be asked on the subject-matter thereof; and the report was disagreed to.

Mr. FRANKLIN from the committee to whom was referred, on the 12th instant, the bill to enable the people of the eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, to form a constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes, reported amendments which were read.

Ordered, That they lie for consideration.

REDEMPTION OF THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The committee to whom was referred the bill making provision for the redemption of the public debt, reported an amendment to the 4th section. This section authorized making loans, in Europe or America, to pay off instalments of the public debt, which fall due in 1803 to 1806, inclusively; and then directs that an equivalent sum shall be laid out in the purchase or redemption of such parts of the present domestic debt as the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund should think proper. The amendment proposed that, instead of the present domestic debt, it should stand, such parts of the present debt of the United States, and other demands against them, as the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund may lawfully pay agreeably to the provisions hereinbefore made.

Redemption of the Public Debt.

In support of this amendment it was alleged, that the act would be defective if the provisions of this clause were not co-extensive with those which are contained in the preceding part of the bill. That it was contemplated, in the bill, to bring three millions, which were in the Treasury, (and which were set apart for payment of demands in consequence of treaties,) to the aid of the present appropriation; and, of course, it would be proper to provide for payment of those demands out of the Sinking Fund. And a reference was made to the third section, in which the special application of the Sinking Fund ($7,300,000) created by the first, and made payable by the second section, is particularly detailed. This application is, 1st. To pay any sums the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund are already bound to pay by former laws.

2d. To pay the interest and charges on the present debt of the United States, including the interest and charges on future loans, for reimbursing or redeeming any instalments or parts of the principal of the said debt.

3d. To pay whatever might be necessary to discharge any instalment or part of the principal of the present debt, and of any future loans which may be made for reimbursing or discharging the same.

4th. To apply the balance of the fund, if any, to the further and final redemption, by payment or purchase, of the present debt, including therein, first, loans for the reimbursement thereof; second, temporary loans from the bank; third, demands against the United States under any treaty or convention with a foreign Power.

It was objected that the act stood better without the amendment. First. Because the object was at once more definite and more proper. The intention avowed had been to apply $7,300,000 to pay the debt foreign and domestic; wherefore, if new loans were made to pay the foreign debt, an equivalent sum ought to be applied to the payment of the domestic debt.

Secondly. Because the amendment seemed to imply the idea that this appropriation was illusory; for that, if it were to be real, the borrowing of any given sum, to meet an instalment of the foreign debt, would leave an equivalent in the Treasury, which would be no otherwise employed than in the redemption of the domestic debt.

Thirdly. Because there was, by the amendment, if not a direct contradiction in terms, such a strange confusion of words as was totally unintelligible. Thus, a part of the second, third, and fourth objects of the Sinking Fund, as pointed out in the third section, is to pay the principal and interest of new loans; and the effect of the amendment is, that a sum equivalent to the new loans should be applied to these objects. Wherefore, it would follow that the money left in the Treasury, by making the new loans, should be applied in paying those new loans.

Fourthly. Because the necessity of the amendment, so far as relates to the demands, in contradistinction to the debts, did not appear; for if, as was stated, a sum of three millions was already appropriated for payment of those demands, any sum borrowed, for temporary convenience, from that fund to aid the sinking fund, must be replaced of course.

Fifthly. Because this amendment tended to defeat the intention of the bill, or at least to render that intention highly questionable. It was reasoning in a circle. Seven millions are to be applied in payment of our debts, foreign and domestic. Instead of paying three millions of foreign debt, which fall due, a new loan of three millions is made. The equivalent sum of three millions, which remains in the Treasury, instead of being applied to pay our domestic debt, is to be employed in satisfaction of demands. And the three millions now in the Treasury, which had been set apart for these demands, instead of being applied to payment of the domestic or foreign debt, is to be thrown into the sinking fund as part of the appropriation which ought to come solely from the revenue.

Sixthly. Because if the effect of the amendment was not such as is last stated, it would at least have that appearance, and give but too much reason for the people to apprehend that they were deceived in the idea held out to them, viz: that, notwithstanding the repeal of the internal taxes, the revenue of the United States would permit the appropriation of so large a sum as $7,300,000 annually to the payment of our debts. Instead of which they would find that this payment was to be made by funds formerly provided, and which are all of them long since appropriated by law to the redemption of the public debt.

The amendment was adopted.

Another amendment was proposed, viz: To strike out from the first section the words "and also future loans which may be made for reimbursing or redeeming any instalment or parts of the principal of the said debt."

In support of the amendment, it was said that the section, as it stood, was unintelligible; and, to prove this, the supporters of the bill were repeatedly called on to explain it; that, if any meaning could be regularly applied to it, that meaning was wholly improper; for it appeared to provide that future loans should be made part of the sinking fund; that, by this section, the sum of $7,300,000, specified therein, was to be made up out of the duties on merchandise and tonnage, if the other objects designated in it should fall short; that these objects are, first, the present sinking fund; second, the sum requisite to pay the principal and interest of the present debt, including temporary loans heretofore obtained; and, thirdly, future loans; that the words moved to be struck out, could not be otherwise interpreted, because it could not, by any figure of speech, be said that the present debt includes future loans to pay the present debt; that even admitting such a strained interpretation, it could not apply to the present case; because the interest of the present debt, being already provided for by law, forms a proper item in the account of those sums which constitute the sinking fund, but if future loans form a part of the present debt, they certainly are a part for the interest of which no provision has been made; that if it was really intended by the patrons of this act to make up the sinking fund by new loans, the measure was disgraceful to Government, would expose the Legislature to contempt, and justly excite the public indignation.

In opposition to the amendment it was said, that the section was very clear and intelligible. That those who did not understand it, must read the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on which it was founded. That those who properly considered the report would easily comprehend the act. That the words which were proposed to be struck out were necessary. That this necessity would appear from the subsequent provisions of the act.

The amendment was lost—yeas 8, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dayton, Dwight Foster, Howard, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Clinton, Cocke, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, J. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

It was then moved to strike out the words, "or any individual or individuals," in the fifth section.

In favor of the motion it was said: That the appointment of an agent to remit annually two millions of dollars, would be not only improper in itself, but highly obnoxious to the merchants of America. That, from the nature of the business, it was to be presumed that a man of mercantile education and habits would be chosen. That whether he was allowed to make commercial speculations for the United States, or confined merely to the purchase of bills of exchange, his powers might be applied to personal purposes. That it would be easy for him to employ his particular creatures to purchase cargoes and make shipments; then purchase bills drawn on the credit of such cargoes, if the speculation should prove successful, share in the profit, and, if ruinous, leave the nominal merchant to be relieved by a commission of bankruptcy. That in the present state of things, when mercantile credit is so much shaken, the command of so large a sum (or even one quarter of it) would give to any merchant great advantage over his brethren. That of course it would excite envy and ill-will among that respectable class of citizens; and let the Government act as they might, blame would light on them. That this was a contrivance to relieve from due responsibility the proper officer, and leave in the stead the responsibility of some one not approved of in the mode required by the Constitution. That it opened the door to a species of patronage, of all others the most pernicious.

To these observations it was replied: That the business in question ever had been, and ever must be, managed by subordinate individuals. That when bills were purchased for the public by the banks, it was always done by the agency of the cashiers. That it was impossible the Secretary of the Treasury could be accountable for the conduct of such business, and therefore his responsibility would be merely nominal. That the agent was to be appointed by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and the respectability of the characters which form that board, left no room to apprehend an improper appointment. That if power to contract with the banks alone was given, the public would be entirely in the hands of those who direct the banks, whereas they ought to have the benefit to be derived from competition.

The amendment was lost—yeas 9, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dayton, Dwight Foster, Howard, J. Mason, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Clinton, Cocke, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

It was then moved to strike out the sixth section, which gives authority to appoint an agent for making loans in Europe.

In support of the amendment it was said: That if any agent were necessary, it ought to be a diplomatic character; because such character, sent to and recognised by the Government of the country, would necessarily have more credit than a common agent. That if any applications should, in the course of such business, be necessary to the Government, it could not be made effectually or properly, unless by such a character. That it did not consist with the dignity of the United States, that an agent charged with an affair so important, should be obliged to apply to under Secretaries, if any business were to be transacted with the Ministers. That the difference of expense (one thousand five hundred dollars annually) was too trivial to enter into so important a consideration; for that one quarter per cent. on six millions would be fifteen thousand dollars. That all business of this sort had hitherto been transacted by the diplomatic servants of America, and had been well transacted. That no man ought to be employed or trusted in so weighty a concern who had not weight of character sufficient for the place of Minister. That if obligations for money borrowed were to be signed, it would have a better appearance that they should be signed by a Minister than by a common agent. That the idea of sending over a mercantile man to do a thing of this sort, founded on an opinion that such men understood it better than others, was unfounded, because it was as foreign to their ordinary occupations as to those of other people. That information on the subject could only be obtained on the spot, and must, from the nature of the case, be derived principally from the bankers of the United States. That the loan must be conducted principally by their skill, and be supported, in a great degree, by their influence; and if not aided by anything more than a common money agent, must rest solely on their credit; because the money lenders could only know through them that the United States were pledged. That the appointment of such an agent, considered in connexion with the other agent already mentioned, might lead to a suspicion that it was intended to provide for favorites by lucrative jobs.

It was answered: That there could be no propriety in sending a Minister for the mere purpose of borrowing money. That persons might be found well qualified for the transaction of this business, who did not possess all the qualifications necessary for a Minister. That the difference of expense was more than fifteen hundred dollars; for that a Minister was entitled to a year's salary (as outfit,) so that in effect the expense would be greater by six thousand dollars. That it might not perhaps be necessary to send any person; and if it should be, then it was wise to send one at as small an expense as possible. That it was the duty of the Senate to economize the public money, and people would be more apt to lend to a nation in which economy prevailed, than to one which lavished its funds on useless officers.

The amendment was lost. The bill was then ordered to a third reading.

THURSDAY, April 22.

MR. BROWN, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 17th instant, the bill to provide for the establishment of certain districts, and therein to amend an act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes," reported it without amendment.

MR. ELLERY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 21st instant, the bill making an appropriation for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and two, reported it without amendment.

Agreeably to notice given yesterday, MR. BRADLEY had leave to bring in a bill to establish, by law, a more uniform manner of holding elections in each State; which was read; and on the question, Shall this bill pass to the second reading? it was determined in the negative.

The bill fixing the time for the next meeting of Congress was read the second time; and on the question, Shall this bill pass to the third reading? it was determined in the negative.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendments reported by the committee to the bill for establishing the Government of the Territory of Columbia; and having agreed in part to the amendments reported, on the question, Shall this bill be read the third time, as amended? it was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Clinton, Cocke, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Dayton, Dwight Foster, Howard, Logan, J. Mason, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, Stone, Tracy, Wells, and White.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to some and disagree to other amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act further to alter and establish certain post roads."

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Theodosius Fowler," was read the third time; and, after debate, Ordered That the further consideration thereof be postponed until Monday next.

FRIDAY, April 23.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill to regulate and fix the compensations of the officers of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments reported by the committee to the bill to abolish the Board of Commissioners in the City of Washington, and to make provision for the repayment of the loans made by the State of Maryland for the use of the city; and having agreed thereto,

Ordered, That the bill pass to the third reading as amended.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill making an appropriation for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and two.

Ordered, That it be recommitted to Messrs. ELLERY, CLINTON, and J. MASON, the original committee, further to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill for the relief of the widows and orphans of certain persons who have died, or may hereafter die, in the Naval service of the United States.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill for the relief of Fulwar Skipwith.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

Ordered, That this bill be committed to Mr. MORRIS, Mr. DAYTON, and Mr. NICHOLAS, further to consider and report thereon.

MR. OGDEN presented the petition of John C. Symmes, praying relief from the operations of an act giving a right of pre-emption to certain persons who have contracted with J. C. Symmes, or his associates, for lands lying between the Miami rivers, in the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio; and the petition was read.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. BRECKENRIDGE, OGDEN, and BRADLEY.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a resolution, authorizing the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to adjourn their respective Houses on the 26th instant, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate. They have passed the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend the Judicial system of the United States," with amendments; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The resolution for adjournment was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments reported by the committee to the bill to enable the people of the eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to form a constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes; and having in part adopted the amendments, the further consideration of the bill was postponed.

Mr. ELLERY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 21st instant, the bill to amend "An act to establish the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes," reported amendments; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

SATURDAY, April 24.

The Senate took into consideration their amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act further to alter and establish certain post roads;" and

Resolved, That they do insist on said amendments, ask a conference thereon, and that Messrs. JACKSON and TRACY be the managers on the part of the Senate.

The Senate took into consideration the resolution of the House of Representatives authorizing the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to adjourn their respective Houses on the 26th instant: and

Resolved, That they do not concur therein.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the widows and orphans of certain persons who have died, or may hereafter die, in the Naval service of the United States," was read the third time.

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until Monday next.

REDEMPTION OF THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The bill, entitled "An act making provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States," was read the third time.

On motion, to strike out, section first, after the word "that," in the second line, to the word "hereby" in the twelfth line, and insert the words,

"In addition to all appropriations heretofore made for payment of the principal and interest of the debts of the United States, (other than surpluses of revenue) so much of the duties on merchandise and tonnage as will amount, with the said provisions, to an annual sum of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to the Sinking Fund; and the said sum of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars is:"

Mr. MORRIS.—Mr. President, there is a part of this act which is proper, wise, and I believe indispensable. But in order that it may produce the desired effect it is essential that the intention of it be rendered clear and intelligible. This is far from being the case at present, and therefore I shall offer an amendment for that purpose. It gave me great pain (the other day when I asked an explanation from those who are its supporters) to be referred to a report from one of our officers. Does it consist with propriety to pass a law which even those who vote for it can in no other way explain than by such a reference? If gentlemen mean to derive credit from this measure among the people of America, it must be understood here, and if they expect to borrow money in consequence of it in Europe it must be intelligible there. The state of our finances renders such loans in my opinion indispensable. But there is an act lately passed, which will arrive in Europe, before any loan can be made, and which will materially injure the credit of this Government. I mean that which repeals a tax on stills and distilled spirits, that had been solemnly pledged for the payment of the public debt. The money negotiators in Holland have before them every one of our acts which relates to the public debt. The instant you propose a new loan, they will produce that repealing law, and tell you their confidence is shaken. To remove the unfavorable impression acknowledging the repeal, you aver that you have (in lieu of it) given a pledge much more important—a pledge of seven million three hundred thousand dollars, and you refer to this act. They read it and say "we can't understand it. You may perhaps have meant to appropriate the sum you mention, but it conveys to our minds a different idea. We can perceive no such pledge." My reason for believing that this will be their language is, that I could not understand the act myself; and that when I asked (from its patrons) an explanation, they did not pretend to give it, but referred me to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. By reading that report I have indeed discovered what it means, but let me say, however, that this meaning is not truly expressed in the act. It was drawn by some person whose vernacular language is not the English, and bears on the face of it evidence of that fact, as I shall presently have occasion to show. This may have occasioned the obscurity which I wish to remedy.

In order that I may convey to the minds of others, those ideas which I have collected from reading and considering the report to which I was referred, I beg leave to make a simple distinction between the first object of the act, which is to appropriate seven million three hundred thousand dollars to the sinking fund, and the subsequent directions how that fund is to be applied. The first object is to be effected by the first section, which, if we are to judge by the Secretary's report, is intended to appropriate (in addition to former appropriations) so much as may be necessary to make up that sum of seven million three hundred thousand dollars. But this does not appear to be the object, if we must judge by the words of the bill. This meaning is not to be collected from them, either on the first impression, or when closely examined. The words are:

"Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of the duties on merchandise and tonnage as, together with the moneys, other than surpluses of revenue, which now constitute the sinking fund, or shall accrue to it by virtue of any provisions heretofore made, and together with the sums annually required to discharge the annual interest and charges accruing on the present debt of the United States, including temporary loans heretofore obtained, and also future loans which may be made for reimbursing, or redeeming any instalments, or parts of the principal of the said debt, will amount to an annual sum of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars."

Now, in order that we may clearly comprehend this enigmatical clause, let us have recourse to algebraic expression. Let A be taken from the former appropriation and B for the additional sum, to make up the seven millions three hundred thousand dollars; which, for brevity sake, I will call seven millions. It is evident that every increase of A, must operate to the diminution of B. If A be five millions, B will be two millions. If A be six millions, B will be one million. If A be seven millions, B will be reduced to nothing. In order therefore to determine the amount of B (the present appropriation) nothing more is necessary than to fix the amount of A. By referring to the clause just read, it will appear that A is to consist of the present sinking fund, of the interest of, and charges on our existent debt, and of the interest of future loans to redeem that debt. If then the two former articles amount to five millions, and loans be made, the interest thereof will amount to two millions, A will be seven millions; although the loans so made, should be applied to extinguish an equivalent amount of the present debt. For let that be made certain, which is made capable of being reduced to certainty. Let the present sinking fund and the interest of the present debt be stated in figures at their precise amount. The amount will form a deduction from B, the appropriation now made, according to the tenor and express words of the clause, leaving it less by that amount. And after it is so lessened, a further diminution is to be made for the interest of future loans. This, sir, is the meaning of our appropriation, when properly analyzed; for if it be not, what I pray is the case of the words, "and also future loans which may be made for reimbursing or redeeming any instalments or parts of the principal of the said debt?" These words cannot relate to those which immediately precede them, for although the present debt includes temporary loans heretofore obtained, it cannot include future loans which may be made. The reference therefore must be to the interest on these future loans as a distinct object. Will it be pretended that this constitutes any part of the present appropriations? Is it not clear that if such loans be applied to the purpose for which they are made, they must extinguish a part of the existing debt? And is it not clear, also, that each of the three articles specified must diminish the present appropriation? Invert the order and say; we appropriate seven millions, less the sinking fund, and less the interest of our present debt, and less the interest of that we may borrow to pay that debt. Take the first article at three millions, and each of the others at two; then seven millions less the sinking fund will be four millions, and less the interest of future loans to pay that debt will be nothing. Here then is an appropriation (or rather here is the semblance of an appropriation) which means (or may be made to mean) just nothing.

But now I will admit, sir, for argument's sake, that some other construction may be given to this clause, (which, however, I cannot devise,) and then I ask, is it prudent to go to Europe with a law of such doubtful complexion, as the ground on which to borrow money? Is this wise? Let me again repeat, that you have injured your credit by a former act. I mean not to arrogate the merit of superior knowledge on this, or, indeed, on any subject; and, if anything which fell from me the other day, had that appearance, it will, I hope, be attributed to the true cause. No man can always be so completely master of himself, when harassed by the flippancy of debate, as not to drop some hasty expression. It has happened that, being on the spot, I have collected information respecting this business, which gentlemen who have not had the same opportunities may not possess. This information, I hold it my duty to give, and every Senator will draw from it his own conclusions. When you are about to open a loan in Amsterdam you must apply to the commissioners or bankers whom you have already employed. Send thither what agent you may, he must employ them, because others will not undertake it; and for two reasons—first, there is a kind of mercantile honor which will restrain them in a considerable degree, and, secondly, they would apprehend the opposition of those from whom the business was taken, and who certainly could throw great obstacles in their way. Under these circumstances, in which you apply to these bankers, and with this law in your hand, what will you say? They will tell you they cannot understand it; that you have taken away one pledge which they understood and on which they relied. They will ask if this new pledge cannot be taken away as easily as that? Admitting the sincerity of your professions, they will ask what security they have against a change of sentiment in the Legislature? They will inquire what check there is in our political organization to prevent a violation of public faith; and how far such checks are effectual? Suppose a satisfactory explanation can be given in answer to these essential inquiries, they will proceed to ask an explanation of the law itself. They will analyze it, and will doubt of the meaning, or, rather, they will perceive in it the meaning which has already been pointed out. How will your Secretary of the Treasury, or his agent, obviate objections? Must these bankers be, as we were, referred to his report? If so, will they not object that this report forms no part of the law? Will they not put the question which suggests itself at the first blush to the most simple observer, Why, if this was your intention, did you not express it in terms so clear as not to be misunderstood? It will not be decent to reply, that the law was drawn by a foreigner and passed by the two Houses of Congress in blind confidence. These bankers understand English; they will not commit themselves lightly, and even if they should, the success would be doubtful. Those who have opened other loans, and who, from that circumstance, stand in opposition, will point out to money-lenders the defects in this law. These people, they will say, speaking of us, meant to pledge seven millions three hundred thousand dollars, or they did not. If they meant it, they would have expressed their meaning in such way as could admit of no doubt. If they did not mean it, they could have had no other intention than to deceive by a false appearance. They, but a few days before, repealed a law pledging, in terms clear and unequivocal, a specific tax to the payment of their debts, and now they offer a vague and general appropriation, in terms obscure and equivocal.

This, Mr. President, is a subject in which neither I nor my friends are any otherwise concerned, than as it relates to the national honor and credit. It is not a measure for which we feel responsibility. It does not excite in us a spirit of opposition. But we wish, I repeat it again, to save the honor and the credit of our country. Gentlemen have thrown away the internal taxes, and are about now to tell the American people that, without the aid of those taxes, they can provide for the current service, and appropriate upward of seven millions as a provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt. This is what they pretend, and I am bound to suppose that this is what they mean; for I cannot presume that they have the wish, much less the intention, to impose upon the people by a vile trick. Surely, they cannot mean, by using an unintelligible jargon, to cheat their fellow-citizens into the idea, that above seven millions are appropriated to this object, when in fact there is no such appropriation. It would be too pitiful a device, and I cannot believe that any gentleman would descend to an expedient so poor, so base, merely to catch a little popularity. Presuming, then, that they really wish what they say, I will now offer an amendment to express that meaning in terms simple, clear, and definite; terms which can easily be understood, and which cannot be misunderstood. I move, therefore, sir, that from the word "that" in the second line, to the word "hereby" in the fourteenth line be struck out, and the words "in addition to all appropriations heretofore made for payment of the principal and interest of the debts of the United States, (other than surpluses of revenue,) so much of the duties on merchandise and tonnage, as will amount with the said appropriation; to an annual sum of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to the sinking fund, and the said sum of seven millions is" be inserted.

Mr. WRIGHT.—I hope we shall not agree to the amendment. This ought not to be done, as appears by the gentleman's own argument. He has said that this law was in the language of a foreigner—meaning, I suppose, Mr. Gallatin. The gentleman has attempted to show the propriety of this amendment, very simply, by using the letters A and B; but he never could get me to C. The language of the act as it stands, is very good, sir. The gentleman finds it very difficult to understand; but, I, sir, understand it fully, and I think it correct and very proper. The Secretary of the Treasury has told us what we ought to do in the premises. He knows, and it is right to do as he says.

Mr. S. T. MASON said: As I understand that amendment, sir, it is to deprive the bill of a very important part of its provisions; to prevent any portion of this money from going to the payment of interest on loans hereafter to be made. If that is the case, I must be opposed to it; and that seems to me to be the intention.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE.—When that amendment, sir, was first shown to me, I did not perceive any material difference between the amendment and the bill. But, sir, if this word "debt," used in the amendment, is to prevent moneys hereby appropriated from going to the payment of new loans, it varies materially from the bill.

Mr. MORRIS.—I did hope and believe, Mr. President, that the distinction I had taken, and which, at the time, appeared to me almost unnecessary, would have had the intended effect of preventing observations, such as we have just heard. I must again request gentlemen to take notice, that the clause to which I have moved an amendment, relates not to the application, but to the constitution of the proposed fund of seven million three hundred thousand dollars. After determining what that fund is to consist of, the act goes on to declare in what manner it shall be applied. The question is not now on the end of the journey, but on the beginning. The gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Kentucky, will see that their observations apply, not to the manner in which this fund is now to be constituted, but to the directions by which it is hereafter to be used; and these directions are contained in the subsequent parts of the act. The plain case is, seven millions three hundred thousand dollars are to be annually applied in payment of our debts. This is a clear and simple proposition. What gave rise to all our difficulties the other day, was, that we really could not understand the first clause of the act. And when we asked an explanation from those who were presumed to understand, as they seemed determined to vote for it, we were constantly referred to the Secretary's report. This last chapter of the Apocalypse, can, it seems, be exposted, only by that first chapter of Genesis. In obedience to the orders of honorable gentlemen on that day, I have since read, examined, and considered the report; and if they also are acquainted with it, they will see that the amendment now before the House, comes up precisely to the ideas contained in the report. It appropriates, in addition to former provisions, so much as will make up the contemplated sum. This form of expression has the advantage, that it must be understood, and cannot be misunderstood. Nay, it obviates all doubt which may arise upon former laws; for it is perfectly immaterial, whether former provisions amount to one million or to five millions, since the balance, be it what it may, is to be made up from the revenue. Is the revenue mortgaged to the amount of only one million, the additional mortgage, by the act, will be six; is it mortgaged to the amount of five millions, the additional mortgage will be one; in short, the final effect will be the same in every supposable case, and your revenue will stand pledged, eventually, to the amount required, of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars. This, gentlemen say, is their object. I do not call in question their sincerity; but, instead of a clause which does not clearly express that object, I have offered one which does clearly express it. If they reject the amendment, they must see the natural conclusion. I leave it, therefore, with them to do as they please.

It passed in the negative—yeas 10, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dayton, Dwight Foster, Howard, J. Mason, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, Tracy, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Clinton, Cocke, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

Mr. MORRIS.—I must now move some other amendments to this section, which will relate only to the language; the first is, to strike out the words, "including future," and insert the words, "and the," so that, instead of the present debt including future loans which may be made, the clause may read "the present debt, and the loans which may be made." I suppose the gentleman will reject this, too, and declare, by their votes, that the present debt includes future loans.

Mr. WRIGHT.—Mr. President, this clause is much better as it is; it is more full and comprehensive. It is according to the meaning and object of the Secretary's report, and I hope it will not be altered.

Mr. DAYTON.—If gentlemen wish to prove that future loans, by which I suppose they mean, if they mean anything, or know what they mean, loans hereafter to be made, are included in the present debt of the United States, they have now a fine opportunity of showing it by their votes, and should reject the amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT.—I insist upon it, sir, the bill stands better as it is; it will not admit of alteration. The language is right enough; it comes up to the object of the Secretary, and to what is proper to be done. I will not agree to alter it.

This amendment was carried.

Mr. MORRIS moved the same amendment in the beginning of the third section.

Mr. M.—This correction of style consists with that which the Senate have already adopted. In fact, sir, the vicious expression frequently occurs, and is merely a Gallic idiom. The word including, is a translation of the words y compris, and in a French law would do very well, but in English, it is nonsense.

Mr. THEODORE FOSTER.—Mr. President, the words, as they now stand, are "the present debt of the United States, including future loans which may be made, for reimbursing any instalments or parts of the same." This is a common mode of expression. It is more comprehensive than the amendment proposed. I find the same expression occurs frequently. It will take time to alter it, and therefore I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Amendment lost—yeas 10, nays 14.

Mr. MORRIS moved several other amendments to the style, most of which were lost.

Mr. MORRIS.—The amendment I now mean to offer is not merely verbal, but of substantial importance; it is, strike out, in the fourth section, the words, "six years after the date of the same, and that the rate of interest thereupon shall not exceed five per centum per annum, nor the charges thereon, the rate of five per centum on the capital borrowed;" and insert the words, "ten years from the period when the same shall be made, and that the total amount of the interest and charges shall not exceed six per cent. per annum on the capital thereof." The object of this amendment, sir, is simply to authorize the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to make loans not reimbursable in less than ten years, if they should find it advisable, instead of six years, as stated in the act. The terms I propose are the same, viz., not to exceed six per cent. interest; for the five per cent. commission and five per cent. interest, on a six years' loan, amount to six per cent. interest, or very nearly so, as gentlemen will see at once, by an operation of common arithmetic. If, with the aid of logarithms, they choose to make the calculation accurately, they will find it is within four cents of six per cent. The effect then of the amendment is, to empower the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to borrow for a term of ten years, if they cannot obtain money on a loan for six years. By stating merely the interest, which is not to be exceeded, it will be in the power of those who execute the business so to arrange it as may be most suitable to the lenders; by commissions, premiums, or otherwise. This, sir, I consider as important; because we cannot, at this distance, determine exactly on the plan which will suit those who are to lend the money; and the way in which loans are made is to inquire into circumstances, and discover the bait which lenders will bite at. One circumstance is important, and must therefore be mentioned. Loans reimbursable at a distant day are more valuable than those of a shorter date. The reason is clear. Those who place their money in public funds, to receive a regular interest, find reimbursement inconvenient, because it compels them to make a new disposition of their capital; and those who buy with a view to subsequent sale, at an advanced price, will of course prefer stock of a durable nature, because it gives sufficient time to look for that advance. Those who, at the close of the American war, bought into the British three per cents., then but little above fifty per cent., and sold out when they had risen much above eighty per cent. (which happened to be the case shortly before the present war,) received near six per cent. interest on their capital, during the investment, and a profit of sixty per cent. on the sale. The English funds are at the door of the Dutch capitalists. They can watch their course, and provide for events as they happen. These and other inducements, to lend money at or near home, will operate against you. It is impossible to say what terms will suit these people, but it is easy to say that certain terms will not suit them. I think you cannot reasonably expect to borrow money on a short credit, because, if the peace continues, the British stock (the interest of which has for more than a century been regularly paid) offers so clear a prospect of gain, from the rise, that those who have money will prefer it to your obligations. When the British funds rise so high that investments in their three per cents. will not give more than five per cent. interest, you will perhaps succeed in borrowing for six years; but if the war should recommence, you will not, I believe, be able to get money on any terms. I shall press this amendment no farther. What I advance is on the ground of private information, from whence I collect that American obligations bearing an interest of five per cent. were in Amsterdam three per cent. below par. So long as this is the case, it is idle to expect that you can borrow at five per cent. for a short term, because any person inclined to lend in that way would rather purchase the obligations at ninety-seven per cent. I leave gentlemen who are connected with the Administration, and who have I suppose correct information from the Head of the Department, to judge for themselves.

The amendment was lost.

Mr. MORRIS.—The untoward state of so many amendments is a sufficient indication that I need not trouble either the Senate or myself with any thing more of that sort. But I feel it my duty to suggest to gentlemen, whose act this is, the propriety of correcting that part of the fifth section which speaks of purchasing remittances. I the rather avoid all attempt to amend it, as I must again acknowledge my ignorance. I know not what is meant by purchasing remittances. I know what it is to purchase bills, bullion, &c., to make remittances. Whether it is intended that when other people have made remittances the things by them sent shall be purchased, or whether (under this vague term) cargoes of produce and of all kinds of merchandise are to be included, I know not. Whether, by the help of the agent contemplated in this clause, the United States of America are to become a trading company, and the loss on bad speculations in trade, is to be made up by taxes on the people, I cannot discover. This last, however, would seem to be the case, from that provision in the section which appropriates so much from the revenue as may be necessary, to pay "the extra allowance or commission resulting from such transactions, and the deficiency arising from any loss incurred upon any remittance purchased or procured." I shall not repeat my objections made the other day to the same agent; but I must say, that it behooves gentlemen to render this part of their act more explicit, unless it be indeed their intention that this agent shall make commercial speculations, and when successful pocket the profit—when unsuccessful saddle the public with the loss.

No answer was made to these observations.

The bill was read a third time, and, on the question, shall it pass:

Mr. MORRIS said,—Mr. President, I have always thought this measure unwise; from what has now passed, I think it worse. In the course of my observations I must refer gentlemen to their favorite document—the Secretary's report. But I suppose nothing I can say will avail; they seem determined to pass the law at any rate.

I said the other day, that the surplus of all our revenue beyond the appropriations, was already pledged to the sinking fund. This gentlemen had the goodness to deny. I pray they will now be pleased to turn to the eighth page of the Secretary's report. They will there find, in the eighth section, among the provisions for the redemption of the public debt, "All surpluses of the revenues of the United States, which shall remain at the end of any calendar year, beyond the amount of the appropriations charged upon the said revenues, and which during the session of Congress next thereafter, shall not be otherwise specially appropriated or referred by law."

It is indeed said, in the third section of the fifth page, that, from certain defects in the mode of doing business, the amount of this surplus cannot be ascertained. He tells us it is uncertain "whether the proceeds of loans should be included in the revenue." I pray gentlemen will attend to this expression. Your Secretary considers it as doubtful whether loans make part of the revenue; and tells you the construction as to that point has not been uniform. He sends you an account to show that, instead of a surplus, there had been a deficiency of near a million from the establishment of the Government to the close of the year 1799; and concludes from that circumstance, that the accounts have been irregularly kept. As to the manner in which the books have been kept, Mr. President, it is of no consequence. It appears by this very report, that, let them have been kept as they may, there is now a surplus of more than three millions of cash in the Treasury. We have just seen that the whole surplus revenue, be it what it may, is appropriated to the payment of our debts. This sum of three millions, therefore, no matter how it got into the Treasury, is already bound to the payment of our debts. As to the difficulties or the blunders in keeping our books, supposing any such to exist, they may be obviated by the Secretary himself, or, if not, it will be easy to make the needful provisions by law. The appropriation formerly made, is not perhaps sufficiently clear and definite, but until the objections be distinctly stated we cannot judge of them, neither can we pretend that any law, much less the law now proposed, can be necessary to remove them. Last of all, can it be pretended that the appropriation does not exist? Let any gentlemen show a single dollar of revenue, except that from the post office, which is not now appropriated. Gentlemen have said otherwise, but let them show it. A part of the internal revenue, indeed, was not specifically pledged, but the whole has been repealed. While I now speak, every farthing of surplus is appropriated to the sinking fund. What then is the effect of this act, fastidiously pretending to redeem the whole public debt? Will it bring one dollar into the Treasury? Or is there a magic in the words of it, by which debts can be paid without money? You undertake to appro-appropriate seven millions, and you have it not to appropriate. I say seven millions, leaving out the additional three hundred thousand, for I must now, for the facility of comprehension, confine myself to round numbers. Your Civil List, including foreign affairs, amounts to a million; your Navy to a million; your Military Establishment to a million and a half. Admit, for a moment, that your boasted economy will reduce these items, (by some trifle,) you see at a single glance, that if this act be passed, ten millions and a half of revenue will be required to meet your appropriations. Now, sir, what is your revenue? When this subject was in question, I had the honor to assign my reasons for believing that the duties would not exceed eight millions, supposing them to be regularly and honestly paid. What have you in addition? Arrears of taxes, sales of land, and the post office. The arrears of taxes will be noticed presently. They form part of the surplus already pledged. As to the post office, the fifty thousand dollars to be derived from that source ought to be expended in the extension of communication; at any rate it is a trifle. The sales of lands, then, is the only fair addition to the duties. I know nothing of the circumstances attending your lands. This fund may be prolific; it may produce nothing. I have, however, many reasons to believe that it will yield less than it has done, but admit that, (instead of 400,000 dollars, the sum estimated by the Secretary,) it should amount to half a million. Admit that your duties produce eight millions, you can then count upon eight and a half. Deduct for the support of Government, three and a half, there remains five. And on this you are about solemnly to pledge yourselves for seven. Let gentlemen consider well what they do. Here is no logical, no metaphysical argument. You can neither deceive others, nor have the poor excuse of ignorance for yourselves. It is a question to be solved by the first rules of arithmetic. You are now about to vote against arithmetical demonstration, and that vote shall be recorded. This, I tell you, is one of the most serious subjects you have yet touched; and seriously will you have to answer for the vote which is now to be given. Consider, then, what you are about. You are about to make appropriations in the face of facts. There must be a deficiency of funds. You know there must. Do you mean, then, to come forward next session, (when that deficiency becomes notorious) and repeal this law? Will you make a solemn mockery—a mere farce—of legislation? What excuse can you devise? Folly is not sufficient. Nothing but madness—downright madness—which indeed is an excuse for anything.

Gentlemen may, perhaps, suppose they can cover themselves under their confidence in the Secretary. I will not examine the decency of that defence, but I tell them it will not serve their turn. Look at the language of this Secretary, in whom they put their trust. In his report of December last he acknowledges that our revenues (taken at the amount he states in that report) will fall short of satisfying this appropriation, and the current service, by two hundred thousand dollars; but that sum will he supposes be supplied by an economy to the same amount. In the letter of the 31st of March, to the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means which forms their report, and to which we have been so often referred, as the Secretary's report, speaking of the $7,300,000, he says: "The ability of the United States, with their present revenue, to apply annually the sum to that object, rests on the correctness of the estimates annexed to that report." Your Secretary is a man of sense. He knew better than risk his reputation on this business. He tells you, expressly, that your ability, even with the revenue we possessed prior to the repeal of the internal taxes, could not be relied on, if those estimates were fallacious. Now sir, if that fallacy has not been demonstrated, it has at least been shown that the correctness of the estimates is questionable. And yet gentlemen are about to adopt these doubtful estimates, and give to them the weight and credit of admitted facts. Your Secretary goes on to say, in the same page, that these estimates "will not be affected by the repeal of the internal taxes, provided, that the retrenchments made in the expenditure shall have been equal to the sum of $650,000, for which credit was taken on account of those taxes." Is, then, the Secretary pledged by anything in this report? Not at all. He tells you if your revenue is sufficient, you can make the appropriation, and as you retrench your expenditures, you may diminish the taxes. He tells you, if the retrenchment be equal to the diminution, the diminution will not affect the appropriation. But he tells you expressly, that even if the truth of his estimates be admitted, the appropriation proposed will occasion a deficiency of $200,000, to which must be added 650,000 more for repeal of the internal taxes. Here then you have a deficiency of $850,000, to be made up by economy and retrenchment. The language of your Secretary, therefore, is, if you admit the revenue to be $9,950,000, and reduce your expenditures for the support of Government from three millions and a half to $2,650,000, you will then have a residue of $7,300,000. But will your revenue amount to so much? No. Have you brought down your expenditures to a sum so small? No. Does the Secretary affirm either of those facts? No. When you shall find yourselves egregiously mistaken, and resort to your Secretary, he will tell you, that he gave you his calculations, and his reasons, and his opinions. That he told you so. But you reasoned and judged and acted for yourselves. Nay he will prove that, so far from vouching that your revenue would amount to the required sum, he had not only expressed a doubt of the fact, but went on to suggest an expedient by which the deficiency might (in appearance at least) be supplied. In the same page 21, he goes on thus: "But in order to run no risk on that ground, I would suggest a modification in the manner of making the appropriation which will effectually guard us, should the annual amount of the net receipts in the Treasury, be more affected by the restoration of peace than has been expected." Here then you see that your Secretary is already employed in guarding against the deficiency, and against the complaints and reproaches which that deficiency must occasion. You will be pleased also to take notice, that this guard is to consist in the manner of making the appropriation. Thus it would seem that your Secretary thinks he can contrive to appropriate from your revenue in such a way as to be effectually guarded, if the revenue does not produce the sum appropriated. But, before you trust to these contrivances, you will do well to consider, that a determination to pay seven millions will not make seven millions.

Let us now look at the Secretary's expedient. We find it in the second section of the twenty-fifth page. After mentioning, in the section which precedes it, a surplus of more than three millions, which had been relied on for special purposes, and of which I shall presently take some notice he goes on thus: "Those estimated three millions may, therefore, be safely relied on in addition to the permanent revenues; and the modification which I would suggest, consists in making the payment of the eventual demands, which may become due to foreign nations, conditionally payable out of the proposed appropriation of $7,300,000 for the debt, with a proviso, that both those demands and the temporary loans might be paid out of other moneys, if the situation of the Treasury should permit it. The effect of this modification would be, eventually, to draw the three millions reserved to assist the current revenues, if these should fall short of the estimates." We find here perhaps the source of that enigmatical language which gentlemen have with such solicitude defended against amendment. Before I examine, however, this modification of the plan held out to us in December, permit me to say some few words about the three million fund. The Secretary tells us these three millions were considered as a provision to meet the probable demands which might arise under the convention with France and the treaty with Great Britain. They were to be derived from the surplus of specie in the Treasury, a sale of bank stock, arrearages of the direct tax, and the stamp duties. The repeal of these last, he tells you, will be more than balanced by arrearages of the internal taxes, which amount to a million. The cash in the Treasury exceeds three million. The bank stock is worth more than a million. Thus we have more than five million, besides the arrears of the direct tax. The conclusion of the Secretary, therefore, that these funds may be relied on for three millions, is so much the more correct, as he has now, in cash, in the Treasury, a greater amount. I must also remind gentlemen of the distinction they dwell on the other day between debts and demands; a distinction which runs through the law before us. They have insisted that these demands form no part of the debt properly so called. Now they will be pleased to recollect, that the three millions of surplus revenue are already pledged to the sinking fund for payment of the debt. Your Secretary, however, sets it apart to pay these demands, which it seems are no part of the debt; and now he proposes that, by way of modification, it constitute, in aid of the revenue, a part of the new sinking fund, and that this new sinking fund be charged with payment of the demands. Thus, after running round the circle, you have not advanced a single inch. Pretending to make an appropriation of seven millions from the revenue to the sinking fund, it is proposed to take more than three millions from that very fund to eke out deficiencies of the revenue. But, after all, this contrivance will not answer the intended purpose. All the surpluses, be the amount what it may, are already pledged to the payment of our debts; and this amount, be it more or less than the three millions stated, must eventually be known with precision. As far as it goes, it is a provision already made for payment of the public debt; and if, for convenience, it be diverted to any other purpose, it must be afterwards replaced by an equivalent sum. It is, then, proper to view the whole subject together. Your Secretary tells you that upwards of seven millions annually will be required, for three years to come, to pay the principal and interest of your debts, and to this must be added at least one million more for the demands under the convention with France and England. Thus you have, in three years, to pay twenty-four millions. Three millions and more are in hand, belonging to the sinking fund; of course you have the means to pay off these demands. But, seeing a great probability that your revenue will fall short, these three millions are to be applied (in aid of it) to make up the seven millions which should be derived solely from the revenue. It is then a loan from the present sinking fund to the revenue, and must be repaid. It operates, we will suppose, to reduce the twenty-four millions to twenty-one millions; still those twenty-one millions must be paid within three years, and that from the revenue. You, indeed, authorize a loan in Europe to meet emergencies, but you repel the idea of paying your present debt by incurring a new debt to a greater amount. You do not, I presume, mean to subject yourselves to this imputation. Of course, the sums so borrowed must be applied in addition to the seven millions. These foreign loans, then, like the three millions borrowed from the sinking fund, are merely for convenience; and the twenty-one millions are still to be paid within three years, from the revenue of those years. If there be a deficit, therefore, of two millions annually, it must eventually appear and be felt. You may, indeed, by this contrivance, provide for the exigency of the moment, but it amounts to nothing. You may amuse yourselves, from morning till night, by taking money out of one pocket and putting it in the other, you will not be one farthing the richer. Suppose, sir, your revenue should fall short of your expectation; suppose that, altogether, it should amount to but eight millions. You pledge, by this act, seven millions. Of course there remains but one million to pay the current expenses, which will require at least three millions. I presume that gentlemen mean to make this seven millions a real appropriation, notwithstanding the mysterious words of their law, and not a mere trick. They surely do not mean to deceive the American people by false appearances. What, then, will they do should they find a deficiency of two millions? Will they come forward again with a violation of the public faith, and repeal this law, after making loans on the credit of it? Or, will they come forward and lay two millions of taxes upon the United States? Here they perish. They have thrown away one million, and must lay on two. We may, perhaps, he told that we wish to perpetuate the national debt. We may hear the trite adage that a public debt is a public blessing, and other pretty sayings. But away with all this paltry witticism; the subject is too serious.

Let it be remembered, sir, once for all, that those who make the necessity, are those who lay the tax. If then by this law taxes become necessary, they impose a tax who vote for this law. Yes, you are about to impose a tax of two millions on the American people. Under the circumstances to which they will be reduced, that tax will be extremely burdensome. It will be oppressive. You are about to lay, without necessity, without reason, a most heavy tax. It is madness, it is worse than madness. You will drive many valuable citizens out of the United States, to avoid the pressure of taxation, into Canada and Louisiana—thus you will add to the wealth and strength of neighboring nations, of nations who may soon become hostile. This is treason!—high treason against the interests of our country! Look to it well. You who vote for this law, shall answer for the pernicious consequences.

It has been said, and may perhaps be repeated, that you can reduce the expense below the present standard. You cannot. I do not mean that you cannot make a piece of paper in the form of a law to that effect, but imperious circumstances will render the reduction impracticable. I ask which branch of service is to be reduced? Is it the marine? Already your little force is employed in blocking up a piratical port, and you may to-morrow hear that Morocco has taken part with Tripoli. This may increase, but cannot diminish the expense of your Navy. You may indeed destroy your ships, and leave commerce to take care of itself. This I hear is a favorite idea with some men. But what, in this case, is to become of your revenue? Among the other wise acts of this Congress, we have thrown away every means of supporting Government and paying debts, except those which commerce may supply. As little is it in your power to reduce that little force which is called your Army. Without looking abroad, there is one circumstance of a domestic nature deserving of attention. A considerable portion of the inhabitants of this country is of a particular species of the human race. Events have taken place, at no great distance, which awaken their curiosity and excite their sympathy. Recent information, from a neighboring State, exhibits symptoms of a disposition which may render the operation of military force indispensable. I will not dilate on this subject, it is better that gentlemen listen to the suggestions of their own minds than to arguments which it may not be prudent to utter. One thing however I must mention: the supporters of the act before us, will be pleased to consider that to suppose the Army can be reduced, would be a reflection upon the present Administration. We know they claim the merit of great economy, and we must therefore presume that they have brought the Army down to the lowest possible standard. If anything more can be saved, why is not that saving now made? Since, then, there is no proposition to that effect, we are bound (out of respect to them) to believe that the idea is inadmissible.

But now, sir let us suppose that your revenue should be equal to this appropriation. What follows? It follows that the appropriation is unnecessary. You will observe, that even by this law, every surplus beyond the seven million is subject to the former appropriations. If, after providing for the current service, seven or seventeen million remain, laws long since enacted make that remainder part of the sinking fund. Every provision, therefore, is made already for redemption of the whole of the public debt—every useful provision. That which is now proposed is useless in so far as it can apply to the existing means of Government, and it is useless in that it can produce no single cent to fulfil the pretended intention. But while in this respect it is unnecessary and useless, it is in another respect pernicious. While the revenue is sufficient, it remains without effect; but it imposes upon the Government a necessity of taxing the people to the extent of any deficiency in the revenue, or else to violate the public faith, to be pledged by this appropriation. What then is the effect of this law? Either it is a miserable deception or else it is an appropriation at once useless and dangerous.

Mr. WRIGHT.—The Secretary of the Treasury has told us that this measure is proper. He, sir, has given us many reasons in the premises. We are told by the Secretary, bottoming himself, sir, upon a full view of all the finances of this country, that seven million three hundred thousand dollars may be appropriated. We must believe him. He is, the proper Executive officer. This is his measure. If this bill is rejected, where is the public faith which gentlemen say so much about? It is ruined. I believe there is a disposition to resist the Government; but we will support the operations of Government. We have confidence. Let gentlemen tell us how they made calculations of what sums were necessary. I am clear that this measure is right, and if it should become necessary to tax our citizens, they are honest enough to bear it. The gentleman from New York, says we shall drive them by the weight of taxes into Canada and Louisiana. If, sir, we have any citizens so base that they would, from that cause, or from any other cause, run away to Canada or to Louisiana, the sooner they go the better. I don't want any such citizens. I hope, sir, we shall pass this law, and not be terrified by the idea that we must lay new taxes.

On the question, Shall the bill pass? it was carried in the affirmative—yeas 17, nays 10, as follows:

So it was Resolved, That this bill do pass with amendments.

MONDAY, April 26.

Mr. ELLERY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 23d instant, the bill making an appropriation for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and two, reported amendments, which were read.

Ordered, That they lie for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and two; a bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand eight hundred and two; and a bill to repeal so much of the acts—the one, entitled “An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States;” the other an act, entitled “An act supplementary to the act establishing the Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States,” as relate to the establishment of the Mint; in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate. They insist on their amendments disagreed to by the Senate to the bill, entitled “An act further to alter and establish certain post roads;” and agree to the conference proposed by the Senate thereon, and have appointed managers on their part.

The three bills first mentioned in the message were read.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill to extend and continue in force the provisions of an act, entitled “An act giving a right of pre-emption to certain persons who have contracted with John C. Symmes or his associates, for lands lying between the Miami rivers in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, and for other purposes.”

Ordered, That this bill pass to the third reading as amended.

The bill making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States in the year one thousand eight hundred and two, was, by unanimous consent, read the second time, and referred to Messrs. BRADLEY, HOWARD, and DAYTON, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments of the House of Representatives to the said bill, entitled “An act to amend the Judicial system of the United States.”

Resolved, That they do concur in all the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, except that which goes to strike out the fifteenth section, in which they do not concur.

The bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand eight hundred and two, was, by unanimous consent, read the second time, and referred to Messrs. BRADLEY, LOGAN, and WELLS, to consider and report thereon.

On motion, it was agreed, by unanimous consent, that the bill to repeal the acts establishing the Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States, be now read the second time.

On the question, Shall this bill pass to a third reading? it passed in the negative.

The bill, entitled “An act to regulate and fix the compensations of the officers of the Senate and House of Representatives,” was read the third time, and passed.

The bill, entitled “An act to abolish the Board of Commissioners in the City of Washington, and to make provision for the repayment of loans made by the State of Maryland for the use of the city,” was read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill do pass as amended.

The Senate resumed the third reading of the bill, entitled “An act for the relief of the widows and orphans of certain persons who have died, or may hereafter die, in the naval service of the United States.”

On motion to strike out the second section of the bill, to wit:

“SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any commissioned or warrant officer of the Navy, or commissioned officer of Marines, have died, or shall hereafter die, by reason of wounds received while in the actual service of the United States, or have been lost at sea or drowned, or shall hereafter be lost at sea or drowned, while in service as aforesaid, and in the actual line of his duty, and shall leave a widow, or if not, leave a child or children, under age, such widow, or such child or children, as the case may be, shall be entitled to, and receive, the half of the monthly pay to which the deceased was entitled at the time of his death, and for and during the term of five years. And in case of the death or intermarriage of such widow, before the expiration of the said term of five years, the half pay for the residue of the term shall go to the child or children of such deceased officer while under the age of sixteen years; and, in like manner, the allowance to the child or children of such deceased, in case there be no widow, shall be paid no longer than during the time there is a child or children under the age of sixteen years.”

It passed in the affirmative—yeas 16, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Brown, Clinton, Cocke, Dayton, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, S. T. Mason, Ogden, Olcott, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Ellery, Dwight Foster, Howard, J. Mason, Morris, Nicholas, Wells, and White.

And having agreed to strike out the third section, and to amend the title by striking out the words “or may hereafter die,” it was

Resolved, That this bill pass as amended.

The bill, entitled “An act for the relief of Theodosius Fowler,” was read the third time; and on the question, Shall this bill pass? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 14, nays 10, as follows:

SENATE.

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Brown, Clinton, Dayton, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Howard, J. Mason, Morris, Nicholas, Ogden, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bradley, Cocke, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Olcott, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

Resolved, That this bill do pass.

The following Message was received from the
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

of the House of Representatives:

In pursuance of the act, entitled "An act supplemental to the act, entitled 'An act for an amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and authorizing the establishment of a government in the Mississippi Territory,'" James Madison, Secretary of State, Albert Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury, and Levi Lincoln, Attorney General of the United States, were appointed Commissioners, to settle, by compromise, with the Commissioners appointed by the State of Georgia, the claims and cession to which the said act has relation.

Articles of agreement and cession have accordingly been entered into and signed by the said Commissioners of the United States and of Georgia, which, as they leave a right to Congress to act upon them legislatively, at any time within six months after their date, I have thought it my duty immediately to communicate to the Legislature.

TH. JEFFERSON.

APRIL 26, 1802.

The Message and documents therein referred to were read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. MORRIS, from the committee to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States of the 29th of March last, on the police of the City of Washington, reported a bill on that subject, which was read, and, by unanimous consent, had a second reading.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the motion made on the 16th instant for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States respecting the choice of Electors for President and Vice President be postponed until the next session of Congress.

TUESDAY, April 27.

The following Message was received from the
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

of the House of Representatives:

The Commissioners who were appointed to carry into execution the sixth article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between the United States and Great Britain, having differed in their construction of that article, and separated in consequence of that difference, the President of the United States took immediate measures for obtaining conventional explanations of that article, for the government of the Commissioners. Finding, however, great difficulties opposed to a settlement in that way, he authorized our Minister at the Court of London, to meet a proposition that the United States, by the payment of a fixed sum, should discharge themselves from their responsibility for such debts as cannot be recovered from the individual debtors. A convention has accordingly been signed, fixing the sum to be paid at 600,000 pounds sterling, in three equal and annual instalments; which has been ratified by me, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

I now transmit copies thereof to both Houses of Congress, trusting that, in the free exercise of the authority which the Constitution has given them on the subject of public expenditures, they will deem it for the public interest to appropriate the sums necessary for carrying this convention into execution.

TH. JEFFERSON.

APRIL 27, 1802.

The Message was read, and referred to Messrs. NICHOLAS, DAYTON, and LOGAN, to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have passed a bill to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill to enable the people of the eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to form a constitution and State government.

On motion, section sixth, to strike out the following words, reported by the committee to be struck out, and which report was amended, as follows:

"Provided, That the convention of the said State shall, on its part, assent that each and every tract of land sold by Congress, from and after the 30th day of June next, shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by order or under authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years from and after the day of sale."

It passed in the negative—yeas 12, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Brown, Dayton, Dwight Foster, Howard, J. Mason, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, Tracy, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Clinton, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

On motion, to strike out the words reported by the committee to be struck out of section sixth, and amended, as follows:

"Third. That one-twentieth part of the net proceeds of the lands lying within the said State, sold by Congress, from and after the thirtieth day of June next, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be applied to the laying out and making public roads, leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic to the Ohio, or to the navigable waters thereof, and continued through the said State: such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the road shall pass."

It passed in the negative—yeas 12, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Brown, Dayton, Dwight Foster, Howard, J. Mason, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, Tracy, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Clinton, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

SENATE.

Proceedings.

APRIL, 1802.

On motion to strike out these words, reported by the committee to be struck out of the sixth section :

"Second. That the six miles reservation, including the salt springs, commonly called the Scioto Salt Springs, the salt springs near the Muskingum river, and in the military tract, with the sections of land which include the same, shall be granted to the said State, for the use of the people thereof, the same to be used under such terms, and conditions, and regulations, as the Legislature of the said State shall direct, provided the said Legislature shall never sell nor lease the same for a longer period than ten years."

It passed in the negative—yeas 8, nays 18, as follows :

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Dwight Foster, Howard, J. Mason, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, and Tracy.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Clinton, Dayton, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, Wells, White, and Wright.

And the bill being further amended, it was ordered to the third reading as amended.

The bill respecting the lands of the United States in the Northwestern Territory was read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill do pass, that it be engrossed, and that the title thereof be "An act to extend and continue in force the provisions of an act, entitled 'An act to give a right of pre-emption to certain persons who have contracted with John Cleves Symmes, or his associates, for lands lying between the Miami rivers, in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, and for other purposes."

The bill sent from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia," was read, and ordered to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of certain districts, and therein to amend an act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,' and for other purposes."

And, after debate, Ordered, That it be recommended to the original committee, further to report thereon.

WEDNESDAY, April 28.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 26th instant, the bill making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two, reported it without amendment.

The Senate resumed the third reading of the bill, entitled "An act to repeal in part the act, entitled 'An act regulating foreign coins and for other purposes.'"

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendment.

Mr. TRACY notified the Senate that he should, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill to carry into effect the resolution of Congress, passed on the 17th day of June, 1777, for erecting a monument to the memory of General Wooster.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments reported by the committee to the bill, entitled "An act to establish the compensations of the officers employed in the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes;" which report was in part adopted.

Ordered, That the bill pass to the third reading as amended.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have passed a bill to revive and continue in force an act, entitled "An act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill, entitled "An act to revive and continue in force an act, entitled 'An act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes,'" was read, and, by unanimous consent, had a second reading.

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed.

Mr. BROWN, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 17th instant, the petition of the traders, pilots, builders, and others concerned in navigation, in the district of St. Mary's river, reported that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition; and the report was adopted.

Mr. BROWN, from the said committee, to whom was also referred the bill to provide for the establishment of certain districts, and therein to amend an act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes," reported it without amendment.

The bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes," was read the third time.

On motion to strike out, section 6th, line 18th, after the word "sell," the words "nor lease the same for a longer period than ten years," and insert "the same, nor derive a revenue from the same:"

It passed in the negative—yeas 6, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dwight Foster, Morris, Nicholas, Ogden, Olcott, and Tracy.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Clinton, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

Same section, line 29th, on motion to strike out the word "sold," and insert the word "granted"—it passed in the negative—yeas 8, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Dwight Foster, Howard, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, Tracy, and Wells.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Clinton, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

And the bill being further amended, on the question, Shall this bill pass as amended? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 16, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Clinton, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin,

SENATE.

Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

YAYS—Messrs. Dwight Foster, Howard, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, and Tracy.

So it was Resolved, That this bill do pass with amendments.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act additional to, and amendatory of, an act, entitled 'An act concerning the District of Columbia;'" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read, and ordered to the second reading.

THURSDAY, April 29.

Agreeably to notice given yesterday, Mr. TRACY had leave to bring in a bill to carry into effect the resolution of Congress, passed on the 17th day of June, 1777, for erecting a monument to the memory of General Wooster; which was read, and, by unanimous consent, had a second reading.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. TRACY, JACKSON, and NICHOLAS, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 26th instant, the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand eight hundred and two, reported amendments; which were read and adopted.

Ordered, That this bill pass to the third reading as amended.

The bill additional to, and amendatory of, an act, entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. S. T. MASON, HOWARD, and STONE, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments reported by the committee to the bill making an appropriation for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and two; which were agreed to.

On motion further to amend the bill, by adding a new section, as follows:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to dismiss so many of the officers of the Marine Corps as will reduce their number and grades in legal proportion to the number of marines retained in service, and that the officers who may be so deranged shall be entitled to receive — months' pay."

vid Brown, of Massachusetts, praying compensation for his sufferings while imprisoned under sentence of the judicial court, for seditious practices; and the petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FRIDAY, April 30.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 29th instant, the bill, to carry into effect a resolution of Congress for erecting a monument to the memory of the late General David Wooster, reported amendments; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill respecting the police of the District of Columbia.

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. MASON presented sundry petitions of the inhabitants of Georgetown, on the Potomac, praying to be authorized by law to assess and collect the necessary taxes for the paving and improvement of that town.

Ordered, That these petitions be referred to the committee who have under consideration the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington."

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the petition of John Cleves Symmes, which was adopted, as follows:

1. That, in the year 1788, the petitioner entered into a contract with the United States, upon a fair consideration, for the purchase of one million of acres of land, in the Northwestern Territory.
2. That, in consequence of such contract, the petitioner made a settlement upon the tract, and sold many parcels thereof to adventurers, who went together with him, into that new country, and located themselves there.
3. That, in the year 1794, the petitioner obtained a patent, under the authority of a law which enabled the President of the United States to make the same, for such proportion of the one million of acres, which had at that time been paid for, pursuant to the said contract, amounting to 311,682 acres of the said million of acres of land.
4. That the petitioner, after the said in part fulfilment of the contract on the side of both the parties to the same, proceeded to make sales (as he before had done in respect to the lands for which he had lately received the patent, as above mentioned) in the residue of the one million of acres, expecting to make the title when he should receive his patent thereof, agreeably to his contract, as he had before practised.
5. That no authority has been given by law, or otherwise, that can be found by your committee, whereby the said contract can be carried into execution on behalf of the United States, upon the payment of the sums further stipulated to be paid by the petitioner, agreeably to his contract, whereby he is entitled to a patent, upon payment of such stipulated sums; which payments the petitioner avers he always has been, and still is, ready to pay and perform, as thereunto required by his contract.
6. That your committee, from the papers and documents laid before them by the petitioner, or from the statement which he has made, do not perceive that the petitioner has done any one act, or omitted to do any act, whereby he has forfeited any right to the full benefit of his contract, before stated.

7. That no authority exists, by law, enabling any person to carry into execution the said contract on behalf of the United States; but, on the contrary, that two laws have been passed predicated upon the idea that the obligations of the United States, under the said contract, have ceased and determined; under the operation of which laws the said petitioner states, and your committee believe, that the said petitioner is suffering very great hardships, tending to the utter destruction and total waste of his whole property.

8. Your committee, the premises considered, beg leave to recommend the adoption of the resolution accompanying this report:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to direct the Attorney General to examine into the contract entered into between the United States and John Cleves Symmes, Esq. and others, bearing date on the 15th of October, 1788, and all the contracts and laws relative thereto; and all the transactions which may legally or equitably affect the same, as far as they may come to his knowledge; and to make a report of the same to the Senate, at their next session, together with his opinion whether the said John Cleves Symmes has any claim, and what, upon the United States, in virtue of the said contract, or any other contract, or law predicated upon the same: and that the further consideration of the petition of said John Cleves Symmes, Esq. of and concerning the premises, be postponed to the first day of the next session of Congress.

And the report was adopted.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States.

Proceedings.

MAY, 1802.

MONDAY, May 3.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to the report of the committee of conference on the bill, entitled "An act further to alter and establish certain post roads." They have passed a resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The resolution was read as follows :

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the said Constitution, to wit :

"That in all future elections of President and Vice President the persons voted for shall be particularly designated, by declaring which is voted for as President and which as Vice President."

Ordered, That it lie for consideration.

The bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia," was read the third time, and further amended.

On the question, shall this bill pass as amended ? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 15, nays 5, as follows :

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Clinton, Cocke, Ellery, Dwight Foster, Franklin, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Olcott, Stone, and Sumter.

NAYS—Messrs. Howard, Morris, Ogden, Tracy, and Wells

Resolved, That this bill do pass with amendments.

On the question, Shall this bill pass as amended ? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 15, nays 5, as follows :

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Clinton, Cocke, Ellery, Franklin, Logan, S. T. Mason, Morris, Nicholas, Olcott, Stone, and Sumter.

NAYS—Messrs. Dwight Foster, Howard, Ogden, Tracy, and Wells.

Resolved, That this bill do pass with amendments.

The bill entitled "An act additional to, and amendatory of, an act, entitled 'An act concerning the District of Columbia,'" was read the third time; and being further amended,

Resolved, That this bill do pass as amended.

The bill entitled "An act making appropriation for carrying into effect the convention between the United States of America and his Britannic Majesty," was read the third time and passed.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act additional to, and amendatory of, an act, entitled 'An act concerning the District of Columbia," with an amendment; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate took into consideration the amendment of the House of Representatives to their amendment to the bill last mentioned.

Resolved, That they do concur therein.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill respecting the police of the District of Columbia; and, on motion, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the third Monday in November next.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Fulwar Skipwith," was read the third time and passed.

The Senate took into consideration the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 1st of May, for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

And, on the question, Will the Senate concur therein ? it passed in the negative—yeas 15, nays 8, as follows :

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Clinton, Cocke, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Sumter, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Dwight Foster, Howard, Morris, Olcott, Ogden, Stone, Tracy, and Wells.

So the question was lost, two-thirds of the Senators present not concurring therein.

On motion that the petition of David Brown be postponed until the next session of Congress, it passed in the affirmative.

On motion that it be

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House, at the next meeting of Congress, authenticated copies of the proceedings in the Courts of the United States, in all cases in which fines and imprisonments have been inflicted upon the individuals under the act commonly called the Sedition act; and, also, in all cases, if any such there be, in which fine and imprisonment have been inflicted upon individuals in the said courts, under the common law of England:"

It passed in the negative.

Mr. TRACY presented the memorial of David Austin, "praying Legislative attention to the order of Providence in the affairs of the nation;" and the memorial was read.

On motion the Senate adjourned to half past seven o'clock this evening.

MONDAY EVENING, 7½ o'clock.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have appointed a committee on their part, with such as the Senate may appoint, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that, unless he hath any further communications to make to the two Houses of Congress, they are ready to adjourn, and they desire the appointment of a committee on the part of the Senate.

The Senate took into consideration the resolution of the House of Representatives appointing a committee, jointly, with such as the Senate may appoint, to wait on the President of the United States and notify him of the proposed adjournment of the two Houses of Congress; and mittee on their part, jointly, with such committee as may be appointed on the part of this House, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications he may think proper to make to them.

The House proceeded to consider the said message of the Senate, and concurred therein.

Ordered, That Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. GRISWOLD, and Mr. DAVIS, be appointed a committee on the part of this House, for the purpose expressed in the message of the Senate.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the rules and orders of proceeding established by the late House of Representatives, shall be deemed and taken to be the rules and orders of proceeding to be observed in this House, until a revision or alteration of the same shall take place.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report standing rules and orders of proceeding to be observed in this House; and that Mr. VARNUM, Mr. GILES, Mr. LEIB, Mr. DAVENPORT, and Mr. HENDERSON, be the said committee.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House cause the members to be furnished, during the present session, with three newspapers to each member, such as the members, respectively, shall choose, to be delivered at their lodgings.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled and ready to receive any communication he may think proper to make to them, reported that the committee had performed that service, and that the President signified to them that he would make a communication to this House, to-morrow, by message.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to a resolution appointing a committee, on their part, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of this House, to take into consideration a statement made by the Secretary of the Senate, respecting books and maps purchased pursuant to a late act of Congress, and to make report respecting the future arrangement of the same; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said resolution: Whereupon, Ordered, That Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. BAYARD, and Mr. RANDOLPH, be appointed a committee on the part of this House, pursuant thereto.

Resolved, That, unless otherwise ordered, the daily hour to which the House shall stand adjourned, during the present session, be eleven o'clock in the forenoon.

TUESDAY, December 8.

Several other members, to wit: from Pennsylvania ANDREW GREGG; from Virginia, SAMUEL J. CABELL; from North Carolina, JAMES HOLLAND; and from South Carolina WILLIAM BUTLER; appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats in the House; the oath to support the Constitution of the United States being first administered to them by Mr. SPEAKER, according to law.

A petition of John McDonald, late of the city of Philadelphia, was presented to the House and read, praying that he may be employed to superintend the arrangement and safe-keeping of the books intended for the library of the two Houses of Congress; and that he may receive such compensation for his services, in that capacity, as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee appointed yesterday, on the part of this House, jointly with the committee appointed by the Senate, to take into consideration a statement made by the Secretary of the Senate, respecting books and maps purchased pursuant to a late act of Congress, and to make report respecting the future arrangement of the same.

The following Committees were appointed pursuant to the standing rules and orders of the House, viz:

Committee of Elections—Mr. MILLEDGE, Mr. TENNEY, Mr. CONDIT, Mr. DENNIS, Mr. HANNA, Mr. STANLEY, and Mr. JOHN TALIAFERRO.

and that they be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. SPRIGG, Mr. BRENT, Mr. FOSTER, Mr. SUMTER, Mr. PLATER, Mr. STRATTON, and Mr. BACON, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Ordered, That the credentials of NARSWORTHY HUNTER, who has appeared as a Delegate from the Territory of the United States known by the name of the Mississippi Territory, be referred to the Committee of Elections; and that they be directed to report whether the Territory is entitled to elect a Delegate, who may have a seat in this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from THOMAS CLAXTON, the Doorkeeper, stating that, in the execution of the various duties attached to his station, certain expenditures will be requisite, and further assistance necessary to be allowed by the House; which was read, and referred to Mr. ELMENDORF, Mr. GRAY, and Mr. BACON.

A petition of James McCashen, and others, was presented to the House and read, stating that they are subjected to great and heavy losses and distresses by the operation of an act, passed at the last session of Congress, giving to persons claiming, by purchase from John Symmes and his associates, a right of pre-emption in certain lands purchased of the United States, to the prejudice of your petitioners' claims as original purchasers under said Symmes, and praying for relief.—Referred to Mr. DAVIS, Mr. HOGE, and Mr. FEARING; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by Mr. Lewis, his Secretary, as follows:

MR. SPEAKER: I am directed by the President of the United States to hand you a Letter, accompanying a Communication, in writing, from the President to the two Houses of Congress.

The said Letter and Communication were read. [Vide Senate Proceedings of this date, ante, page 11.]

Ordered, That the said Letter and Communication be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

ACCOUNTS OF T. PICKERING.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House an account of all moneys received by Timothy Pickering, Esq., former Secretary of State, together with Mr. Pickering's account of disbursements, and his vouchers for the same.

Mr. NICHOLSON observed, that he conceived this measure necessary on account of the clamor that had been raised, the publications of various newspapers, and the agitation of the public. He considered it a duty due to his constituents to give them complete satisfaction on this subject. Mr. N. was one of the committee appointed to examine the accounts of the Treasurer the last session. He did not think that committee authorized to attend to any other than the Treasurer's accounts, and the mode of keeping them. He hoped, for the reasons before mentioned, and for the entire satisfaction of all, that the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. GRISWOLD rose.—He observed that he also was a member of that committee; that he differed much from the gentleman last up, relative to the powers of that committee. He believed that committee were authorized to examine all the accounts of the Treasury; that Mr. Pickering's accounts were examined, and that the vouchers were also examined, a certain bundle of papers excepted, which the committee were informed were vouchers on a particular account, but which the committee thought it too tedious to critically investigate as they were knowing to the appropriations. Mr. G. thought the argument of present alarm or public agitation futile, as that clamor had existed previous to the investigation of the committee a year since; that it was needless to investigate those accounts again and again; it would employ their whole time. But he wished particularly to know the gentleman's object; something appeared to be in view which he could not understand; he wished the gentleman fully to explain himself. Mr. G. conceived that it did not come within the precinct of the duties of the House to settle the accounts of Mr. Pickering; that House was not a board for that purpose. Mr. G. had no objection, other than on the grounds of inconsistency, to the resolution.

Mr. NICHOLSON said, the gentleman and himself differed as to the power of the committee that had attended to the investigation of the Treasury accounts; he believed they were not authorized to enter into an inquiry whether all the moneys received by Mr. Pickering were properly appropriated; this was his object. He had been informed, of late, that Mr. Pickering had, in some instances, appropriated more money than he was allowed, and had sometimes appropriated money to purposes, though public purposes, otherwise than ordered; it was his wish that the House should adopt some regulations in these matters, not having appropriations discretionary with officers, and the better to enable the Comptroller to settle his accounts. He was sensible of the impossibility of their making a thorough investigation, and that they must trust to the Treasury for information; but that when the attention of the people was called to particular characters in this manner, it was their duty to satisfy them; he did not wish to single out Mr. Pickering alone; he wished equal reference to others. The proposed resolution was not on account of any doubts in his mind; he did not entertain the least suspicion that Mr. Pickering had ever appropriated to his own use, or defrauded the public of a single dollar; he believed him to be a man of irreproachable honesty and integrity; but the report of the former committee did not say enough.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—He presumed it very probable that there had been occasionally excess of appropriations; every man acquainted with public business knew that the public service would have suffered had not this been the case. Most members knew how often this had happened, and how often Congress had justified, and granted afterwards, this excess of appropriations; laws cannot always touch contingencies. It had often been the case in the office of the Secretary at War; Congress afterwards made up the expenditure, the excess appearing fairly and necessarily applied; so it may have been in the office of the Secretary of State.

The resolution was postponed till Monday next, and then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 9.

Another member, to wit: JOHN CAMPBELL, from Maryland, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

A petition of Henry Mumbower and others was presented to the House and read, praying a reimbursement of the fines and penalties incurred by the petitioners, for a supposed attempt to impede the execution of the law laying a tax on lands and dwelling houses within the United States, and for which they were convicted and sentenced by the circuit court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania.—Referred to Mr. LEIB, Mr. CAMPBELL, and Mr. JOHNSON, to examine and report the same, with their opinion thereupon to the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an account of the receipts and expenditures of the United States for the year 1800, together with a letter from the Register of the Treasury, in relation thereto; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

THURSDAY, December 10.

Mr. MITCHILL presented a petition of certain aliens residing in New York and its vicinity, stating the injuries they suffer from the naturalization law, and praying the House to afford such relief as they shall deem fit.

After some conversation as to the disposition of the petition, it was agreed that it lie on the table, until that part of the President's Message on the same subject be taken up by the House.

A petition to the same effect was presented by Mr. MITCHILL from certain alien residents in the county of Montgomery, State of New York.

Mr. GILES moved the reference of this petition to the Committee of the Whole, to whom had been referred the President's Message.

Mr. G. and Mr. MITCHILL considered this mode of disposition proper to be pursued in all cases where abstract principles were to be settled. Such was the present case. The facts were notorious and indisputable.

Mr. GRISWOLD advocated the reference of all petitions to a select committee. In considering them, facts might arise, which could only be elucidated by a select committee.

Mr. GILES's motion was carried.

A petition of Sarah Fletcher and Jane Ingraham, widows and relicts of Patrick Fletcher, late commander of the United States' frigate Insurgent, and of Joseph Ingraham, late a lieutenant on board the United States' brigantine of war Pickering, was presented to the House and read, praying that the petitioners may receive, for and during their respective lives, an annuity equivalent to the half pay of their husbands, respectively, in consideration of their loss, in the capacities aforesaid, with their vessels and crews, whilst in the public service of the United States, some time in the year 1800.—Referred to Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. GODDARD, Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. GILES, and Mr. STANTON; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. ELMENDORF, from the committee to whom was referred, on the eighth instant, a letter from THOMAS CLAXTON, the Doorkeeper of this House, relative to certain expenditures, and further assistance necessary to be allowed for enabling him to execute the duties of his station, made a report; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That THOMAS CLAXTON be, and is hereby, authorized to employ, under his immediate direction, one additional assistant, two servants, and two horses, for the purpose of performing such services and duties as are usually required by the House of Representatives, during the present session, and for four days thereafter; and the sum of five dollars and seventy-five cents per day be allowed to him for that purpose; and that he be paid therefor out of the fund appropriated for the contingent expenses of the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have proceeded to the appointment of a Chaplain to Congress, on their part, and the Rev. Mr. GANTT has been duly elected.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to be made in the acts establishing a post office and post roads within the United States; and that the said committee have power to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. SOUTHARD, Mr. ARCHER, Mr. NEW, Mr. BOUDE, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. WALKER, and Mr. LEMUEL WILLIAMS, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

The House proceeded, by ballot, to the appointment of a Chaplain to Congress, on the part of this House; and, upon examining the ballots, the majority of the votes of the whole House was found in favor of the Reverend WILLIAM PARKINSON.

FRIDAY, December 11.

Several other members, to wit: from New Hampshire, JOSEPH PEIRCE; from Massachusetts, PELEG WADSWORTH; from Virginia, THOMAS CLAIBORNE and JOHN CLOPTON; and, from North Carolina, WILLIAM H. HILL, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats in the House.

Revenue Laws.

H. or R.

Mr. MILLEDGE, from the Committee of Elections, reported that the committee had, in part, examined the certificates and other credentials of the members returned to serve in this House, and had agreed upon a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Samuel Meredith, late Treasurer of the United States, accompanying his general accounts of the receipts and expenditures of public moneys, from the first of October, one thousand eight hundred, to the thirtieth of June, one thousand eight hundred and one, inclusive; also, his accounts of receipts and expenditures for the Navy and War Departments, commencing the first day of October, one thousand eight hundred, and ending the thirtieth of September, one thousand eight hundred and one; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. NICHOLSON observed that, during the last session a committee had been appointed to inquire into the expediency of amending an act entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters;" but, from the lateness of the period when the committee was appointed, and from the pressure of other business, the subjects, though important, had been neglected. He, therefore, now moved the appointment of a committee for the same purpose.

The motion was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of amending the act, entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters;" and that the said committee be authorized to report by bill, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. GODDARD, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. JOHN SMITH, of Virginia, and Mr. LOWNDES, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. S. SMITH, after a few introductory observations, moved that the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to inquire whether any, and what alterations may be necessary in the acts laying duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States.

Mr. GRISWOLD thought that the subject, belonging to the revenue, properly attached itself to the Committee of Ways and Means. He contended that any alteration whatever would either increase or diminish the revenue, and therefore belonged to the financial system, which the Committee of Ways and Means especially had in charge; on that account he moved its reference to that committee.

Mr. SMITH contended that it was usual and necessary for the subject to be discussed by commercial men, of whom alone the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures was composed. It was desirable to consolidate all the revenue system as much as possible into one law; it was also desirable to know the precise state of our imports, and of our progress in manufactures. By a reference to commercial men, the House, besides those, might be acquainted with a very desirable object, to wit: how far certain articles would bear additional duties, or how far others admitted a diminution, proportioned to the wants of the country.

Commercial men were practical men, and, therefore, without disparaging the merits or talents of gentlemen composing the other committee, whose express appointment did not so pointedly relate to commerce, but to revenue, he thought the original motion ought to be carried.

Mr. GRISWOLD had no doubt, but that either committee would do justice to the subject; but it was a usual reference for all subjects relating to revenue. It certainly contemplated a total revision of that part of the revenue, and he again contended that all matters relating to revenue ought to go to the Committee of Ways and Means, for which purpose alone that committee was formed. He should not have risen, he said, but that he did not see the chairman of that committee in his seat.

The SPEAKER said, that either reference was perfectly in order; and that, therefore, either motion would have been proper. The reference to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, at present, had the preference, being first moved.

Forty-six rising in the affirmative, and being a majority, the reference moved by Mr. SMITH was carried.

MONDAY, December 14.

Another member, to wit: LEWIS R. MORRIS, from the State of Vermont, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

A memorial of John Hobby, late Marshal of the District of Maine, in the State of Massachusetts, was presented to the House and read; stating that he is now, and has been for more than five months past, confined in Portland jail, in said State, for a debt due from the memorialist to the United States, which he is unable to pay; and praying such relief in consideration of his past services, advanced age, and injuries sustained in his health by the imprisonment to which he has been subject, as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.—Referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, to report his opinion thereupon to the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with a report and estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand eight hundred and two; also, a statement of the receipts and expenditures at the Treasury of the United States, for one year preceding the first day of October, one thousand eight hundred and one; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency or in expediency of giving further time to persons entitled to military land warrants to obtain and locate the same.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to report what provision ought to be made, by law, to authorize the Secretary of War to issue military land warrants; and that the committee also report, what provision ought to be made, by law, to authorize the Secretary of War to issue duplicates where satisfactory proof is made that the originals have been lost, destroyed, or obtained by fraud.

Ordered, That Mr. DAVIS, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. TALLMADGE, Mr. DENNIS, and Mr. FEARING, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolutions.

The Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business reported, in part, that they had examined the Journals of the late House, and found in an unfinished state sundry bills, reports, and petitions, which they specify. The committee concluded with a resolution that all petitions, &c., depending in the last House, be taken up at the instance of a member, or on the application of the petitioner.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved that the Committee of Claims be directed to inquire into the expediency of allowing the refugees from Canada and Nova Scotia further time for exhibiting their claims for lands under the act for their relief.—Agreed to, 40 to 33.

DISBURSEMENT OF PUBLIC MONEY.

Mr. NICHOLSON called up the resolution, laid by him on the table, respecting the expenditure of public moneys by Timothy Pickering, Esq., late Secretary of State. Mr. N. observed, that some ideas expressed by a gentleman from Massachusetts, when this subject was before the House, had weight with him, and had induced him to modify his motion. It had been very properly, in his opinion, remarked, that such a motion should not point at any particular officer, but that it should be extended to all officers who superintended the disbursements of public money. He had, therefore, prepared another resolution, which, while it embraced his first object, would be seen to be connected with other objects equally interesting, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report, whether moneys drawn from the Treasury have been faithfully applied to the objects for which they were appropriated, and whether the same have been regularly accounted for; and to report, likewise, whether any further arrangements are necessary to promote economy, enforce adherence to legislative restrictions, and secure the accountability of persons entrusted with the public money."

Mr. BAYARD declared his high pleasure at the liberality and candor which characterized the mover of the resolution; which had been manifested on the institution of it, as well as in the modification now offered. The motion, as it now stood, however, was not confined to one department, but embraced the whole. He thought it would be best to confine it to one department; but to give it a more retrospective effect, and to apply it not to Mr. Pickering only, but also to Secretaries of State that preceded him. He believed that, on investigation, it would be found that moneys disbursed had not been expended conformably to the strict letter of appropriations. But such a deviation was the result of necessity. The public service forbade delaying certain measures, for the execution of which competent appropriations had not been made, to the next session of Congress. He believed that the same thing had occurred in other departments. It had been the custom, in cases where money was wanted for one, though appropriated to another, under the same department, to take it from the latter and to apply it to the former. This was illegal; but its being the custom palliates it.

Mr. B. could not but approbate the conduct of the gentleman from Maryland. He had, honorably to himself and honorably to Mr. Pickering, declared his conviction that Mr. Pickering had acted like a man of honor and integrity; and that though he had sanctioned departures from the letter of appropriations, yet, that this had been only as he had termed it a technical misapplication of money. For this inquiry, Mr. B. thought there was sufficient cause. The public mind had been agitated. The vilest slanders had been circulated. It had been averred, not merely that Mr. Pickering had violated the appropriation of public moneys, but that he had applied them to his own personal purposes. But, after the praiseworthy candor of the gentleman, he trusted that all false impressions would be removed; and that it would be found that all the noise made, arose from inattention to prescribed appropriations of money; and that the same inattention applied to the other departments.

Mr. B. desired to know the extent of the motion. If confined to the Department of State, embracing all the Secretaries, he would be in favor of it.

Mr. NICHOLSON would answer the gentleman from Delaware, that it was his intention that the motion should apply, as far as it affected the Department of State, not only to Mr. Pickering, but to his predecessors also; and he had so framed it as to include the Departments of War and the Navy, in case the committee saw fit so far to extend their inquiries. The accounts of the Department of State could be easily examined, while those of the War and Navy Departments, from the want of specific appropriations, precluded so precise an investigation. But the committee may examine the subject, and the terms of the resolution gave them authority to pursue their inquiries, if they thought fit, into those departments. They may also go back, if necessary. For himself, Mr. N. had no objection to this. Not that he thought such a measure necessary, as it was well known that the accounts of Mr. Pickering's predecessor had been settled, and that a suit, which had arisen from such settlement, was now depending. He had plainly answered the inquiries of the gentleman, and he hoped satisfactorily.

Mr. GILES observed, that he had always been in favor of giving the people the fullest information on the expenditures of public money. It would be recollected that he was among the first to institute an inquiry into the disbursements of the Treasury under this Government. It was true that his efforts were attended with but little success; they had been treated with but little respect; and he might, perhaps, add that they had been treated with some share of disrespect. He rejoiced, however, in the change which had taken place, and he expected that this House would hereafter be as jealous of public disbursements as he had long been.

The disbursement of public treasures excited, and deservedly excited, the national sensibility. The people felt it as all important. He was, therefore, well pleased with the resolution, whose effect would be to inquire into the conduct of all present and past Secretaries. As the whole would be included, it would exclude all party consideration.

He hoped that they were now assembled to legislate for the public good; and that, standing on the ground of truth, all calumny, let it come from whatever quarter, would be dismissed. He felt no ill will to any public officer, but he thought the official conduct of all of them should be tested by facts. He believed there had existed practices dangerous to our happiness, and his remarks were directed against those practices, not against any particular persons. If inconvenience and injury had sprung from the practices, we should find a remedy for them.

Mr. G. hoped that, at the commencement of a new Administration, all the doors of information would be thrown open, that the people might be well informed, and be able to repel all calumnies that were propagated, and know where real blame attached.

Mr. G. said, he wished to know when the practice alluded to commenced. The House sat here as a board of inquiry into the transactions of the Government, and without respect to any particular man; it was their duty to inquire into the conduct of all. He, therefore, hoped not only that this motion would pass, but that something similar to it would be incorporated in the standing rules of the House, whereby the act of inquiry would be general and a matter of course. If this should be done, the measures of all the departments would pass in review every session, and checks would be sufficiently multiplied to satisfy the public mind.

Mr. MITCHELL professed himself well pleased with the substitute offered to the original motion, which had, in some measure, excited his surprise. When an individual of great probity, and who had long served his country, was pointed at by the original motion, he could not avoid a painful sensation. The mover had wisely resolved, under the influence of such feeling, to modify his motion, and to make it general, instead of particular. Mr. M. did not know how business had been transacted in the departments, but he did know that suspicions and slanders had been levelled at our public officers. It was in the power of the House, if they were unfounded, to disperse them. The House might be considered as the protector of the innocent.

Mr. M. did not believe the gentleman pointed at had been guilty of corruption. He believed what was so called, was an allowable departure from the strict letter of the law, in order to promote the public good.

Mr. BACON said, if he understood the motion, it had nothing to do with the conduct of Mr. Pickering—it not only contained no particular reference to him, but avoided all personal reference to any of the officers. It applied solely to the expenditure of public money. He, therefore, saw no reason for bringing him or any other person into view. When an inquiry had been made, it would be time enough to approve or condemn the conduct of public agents.

Mr. BAYARD perceived no difference of opinion among gentlemen. All expected in the abstract, as well as in the present case, that the conduct of public officers should be examined, and the result laid before the House. He, however, did not think the statement made by the gentleman from Virginia perfectly correct, when he told the House that his endeavors to obtain an inquiry into the state of the Treasury had been treated by a late House with disrespect.

Mr. B. said, his own information might be incorrect, as it was taken principally from the prints of the day; but he would say, that since he had been a member of that House, there had been no case, where an investigation was asked, in which a majority of the House had not sanctioned it without hesitation.

He recollected an investigation made at the instance of the gentleman from Virginia, into the conduct of a former Secretary of the Treasury; that the investigation did proceed; and that the very gentleman had a full opportunity of satisfying his own mind on the correctness of the conduct of that officer. If there had been a case in which a majority of that House had opposed an investigation, it was not within his knowledge. For his own part, he never had opposed, nor never would, the freest investigation of the measures of public agents, whatever Administration had the Government in its hands.

With respect to the contemplated motion announced by the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. B. did not know but it might produce the most serious inconveniences, if not injuries, to the Government. An imperious and irresistible necessity might force your officers to go beyond the limits of an appropriation. Appropriations that are made are usually prospective. They are necessarily, in many cases, imperfect. They may, of course, either exceed or fall short of the object for which they are intended; and you must, to make good the deficiency of one, draw upon the excess of another. This procedure had been introduced, and had been formed, he believed, into a general practice. He did not know that any department had exceeded its aggregate appropriation; but the redundancy of one appropriation had been made use of to supply the deficiency of another, under the same department. He did not know that any detriment would flow from such procedure. The officer who made the deviation, knew that he did it on his own responsibility, and that his conduct would be strictly scrutinized. From this view of the subject he did not dread the inconvenience suggested.

Mr. B. said, he would illustrate his ideas by stating what had come to his particular knowledge. According to one of the stipulations made between the United States and Spain, a boundary line was to be run between the United States and the possessions of Spain, for which $60,000 were appropriated. The act of running the line was in execution, unfinished, and our commissioners in the wilderness, when the appropriation run out; and this was during the recess of Congress. What was to be done? Were we to dis-appoint a foreign Government and stop the whole business? No. There being money appropriated to the department for other purposes, more than was required, the Secretary of State applied it to this purpose.

Mr. B. thought it proper, on this occasion, to state that Mr. Pickering had clearly shown that every dollar of public money that had gone through his hands had been applied to the public service. This information he had from the most authentic source; nor should he here state it were it not entitled to the fullest confidence.

Mr. B. concluded by observing that, in his opinion, the resolution was too broad; it applied to all moneys expended, no matter by whom; it was imperative upon the committee to make the most extensive inquiry. To obviate this difficulty, he would move, if agreeable to the mover of the original resolution, to confine it to the Heads of the Departments.

Mr. BACON thought the resolution stood very well. Instances would doubtless occur under every Government that would justify a deviation from the rigid prescription of law. But he was of opinion that it would be time enough to make such remarks as had fallen from gentlemen, when such instances are satisfactorily shown to have occurred.

Mr. GILES was happy in the calm spirit with which the session commenced, and he hoped the same spirit would attend the deliberations of the whole session. He must, however, be permitted to say that the gentleman from Delaware had been inattentive to the course of events, or he would have been more correct in his statement of the circumstances which had attended the case to which he (Mr. G.) alluded.

There was no doubt that after great efforts made by him to obtain an investigation of the official conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury, an inquiry had been made; but the result of that inquiry, as submitted, was far from being satisfactory, and did not embrace many of the material points. The gentleman was incorrect in another statement. He had not, as declared by the gentleman, yielded his assent to the correctness of conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury. The gentleman, doubtless, had the information he gave the House from certain newspapers that he and many other gentlemen were in the habit of reading.

But such authority did not authenticate the information. The fact was otherwise. The inquiry made had produced different convictions on his mind. From the inquiry then made, which, in its review the House may deem it proper to avail itself of, it would be found that the gentleman then at the head of the Treasury, had been employed for three years in drawing money from Holland, and that on this was founded the Bank of the United States. Mr. G. thought it barely necessary to make this explanation. He was sorry for the necessity of making it on this occasion, which he should not have done but that it was extorted from him by the incorrect remarks of the gentleman from Delaware, which rendered it necessary for him further to say, that he never had been, and never could be, satisfied with the then Secretary for breaking down the great barrier of appropriations.

As to the imperious circumstances, mentioned by gentlemen, which compelled a violation of appropriations, he agreed in the necessity which might sometimes exist; but when such a violation occurred, the causes of it ought to be truly imperious, and ought to be stated immediately to Congress, who was the only judge of the propriety of the measure, and not the man who had usurped their decision.

But the deviations are not new; they appeared to be of long standing, from which, in his opinion, great mischief and no good had resulted. He, however, did not wish to enter into a discussion until a report was made. He forbore, therefore, making any further remarks.

Mr. LOWNDES hoped the inquiry would take place; but thought the terms of the resolution too comprehensive. It does not say where the examination shall begin or where terminate. The committee may examine into the conduct of one officer, or every officer. He believed it to be the practice of all deliberative bodies to prescribe definite duties to its committees. He, therefore, hoped that the House would limit the report to certain points, that a definite duty may be required, and a definite report made. The task, unless defined, would be herculean.

Mr. CLAIBORNE was surprised at the expression of any sensibility for Mr. Pickering, or any other man; when he read that part of the Constitution that directed that all moneys should be expended under appropriations made by law, and heard gentlemen justify departures from this Constitutional injunction, he was truly astonished. If Mr. Pickering had departed from the directions of the law, to say so was no calumny. The committee proposed to be formed will inquire into all circumstances, and the public officers will be applauded or virtually censured. We are accountable to the people for the expenditure of their money, and it is proper that our public officers should be accountable to us.

The question was then taken on Mr. NICHOLSON's motion, without modification, and carried without a division, and a committee of seven members appointed, viz:

Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. GRISWOLD, Mr. GILES, Mr. HASTINGS, Mr. JONES, Mr. BAYARD, and Mr. ELMENDORF.

DECEMBER, 1801.

President's Message.

H. OF R.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The House, according to the standing order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, the Message of the President being under consideration.

Mr. S. SMITH observed that, among other objects to which the President had attracted the attention of the House, was our commercial situation. We were informed that the United States were at peace with all nations, and that peace had taken place among the Powers of Europe. It became Congress to direct its attention to consequences that might proceed from such a state of things; and particularly to the injuries that might attach to our carrying trade. It was known that under the British Treaty, Great Britain, going perhaps beyond the meaning of the treaty, had imposed heavy countervailing duties on our goods, and that certain acts of France had the same effects, whereby many of our most valuable exports would cease to be carried in our own bottoms. Early under the present Government it had been deemed wise to lay discriminating duties, which had tended greatly to assist our carrying trade. Our capital had greatly increased, and if foreign nations restricted our trade by unfair regulations, it became us to adopt counteracting measures; and this could now be done with the more safety and effect from the force of our capital. He, therefore, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, as imposes a discriminating duty of tonnage between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, and between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, ought to be repealed; such repeal to take effect whenever the President shall be informed that the discriminating duties of foreign nations, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the commerce of the United States, shall have been abolished."

Ordered, To lie on the table.

Mr. GILES.—Among the various topics of the Message is that in relation to the Census. It is important that Congress should be early occupied in deciding the ratio of representation, as many of the State Legislatures are now in session, and will be specially convened, if they shall rise before Congress shall pass a law upon the subject. He, therefore, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the apportionment of Representatives amongst the several States, according to the second enumeration of the people, ought to be in a ratio of one Representative for every thirty-three thousand persons in each State."

On which the question was taken, and the motion carried without a division.

Mr. S. SMITH said, another important member of the President's Message respected our situation with the Barbary Powers. It became Congress immediately to come to a decision that would enable the President more efficiently to protect our trade. He, therefore, moved the following:

Resolved, That it is expedient that the President be authorized by law, further and more effectually to protect the commerce of the United States against the Barbary Powers."

Mr. NICHOLSON said, he did not like the resolution, as it had reference to a point with which we were unacquainted. The President had informed us that he had sent a squadron into the Mediterranean. It may have been a wise act, but he did not wish the House to commit itself until fully informed. He moved, with this view, to strike out the words "further and more effectually."

Mr. GILES proposed that the motion lie on the table until the documents on this subject were printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHILL alluded to his having presented two petitions from aliens in New York, and then moved the following:

Resolved, That the laws respecting naturalization ought to be revised."

Mr. GILES thought the motion ought to be so drawn as to bring the principle before the House, for which purpose he moved to add "or amended." Agreed to.

So the motion, as amended, was carried.

The Committee then rose, and reported the two resolutions agreed to.

TUESDAY, December 15.

A memorial of William Kilty, chief judge of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, was presented to the House and read, stating that by the last section of an act of the last session of Congress for altering the time and places of holding certain courts therein mentioned, it has been made the duty of the memorialist to hold the district courts of the United States in and for the District of Potomac, in virtue of his office, under a prior act of Congress concerning the District of Columbia; and praying an increase of the compensation allowed him by law, in consideration of the additional labor and inconvenience to which he is thereby subjected.—Referred to Committee of Claims.

The House proceeded to consider the resolutions reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union: Whereupon, the first resolution being again read, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That the apportionment of Representatives amongst the several States, according to the second enumeration of the people, ought to be in the ratio of one Representative for every thirty-three thousand persons in each State."

Ordered, That the consideration of the said first resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

The second resolution being again read, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the laws respecting naturalization ought to be revised and amended.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. MITCHILL, Mr. GODDARD, Mr. SMILIE, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. LEWIS R. MORRIS, Mr. WADSWORTH, and Mr. STANFORD, do prepare and bring in the same, Ordered, That it be an instruction to the committee to whom it was referred to report by bill, or otherwise, whether any, and, if any, what alterations or amendments are necessary in the act concerning post offices and post roads, that they make provision for extending the privilege of franking to the Attorney General of the United States.

BARBARY POWERS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, the following resolution being under consideration:

Resolved, That it is expedient that the President be authorized by law, further and more effectually to protect the commerce of the United States against the Barbary Powers."

Mr. NICHOLSON said, that when this resolution was yesterday laid on the table, he had moved, for reasons that he had assigned, to strike out the words "further and more." He was, on reflection, more and more persuaded of the accuracy of his objections to the unqualified terms of the original motion. If we adopt it, we pledge ourselves to increase the naval force at present at the disposition of the President. But if his modification were agreed to, every gentleman would remain at liberty to put his own construction on the words "effectual force." Uninformed as we were as to the necessity of increasing the force, it would be highly improper to commit ourselves by any precipitate decision. He, therefore, moved to strike out the words "further and more."

Mr. GILES opposed the striking out the words, which, in his opinion, did not relate to the quantum of force placed under Executive disposition, but to the measures proposed to be taken by the Executive. He should vote for the motion unamended, though he had been, and still was, as averse as any gentleman in that House to an improper augmentation of the Army or Navy. With respect to the Navy, he was friendly to it as it now stood, or to an augmentation of it to meet any particular emergency.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that as he understood the resolution, it went not to pledge any man to augment the Navy, but to authorize the President, with the present force, to take measures for the defence of our trade. We were at war with Tripoli. Against that Power, therefore, the President felt himself at liberty to act efficiently. But gentlemen should advert to our situation with regard to Algiers and Tunis. Those Powers may become hostile. They may become so in the recess of Congress. It may be necessary without delay to protect our trade against them. Will you then confine the President, in relation to these Powers, to a Peace Establishment? Certainly, when these circumstances were duly weighed, no gentleman will refuse the power which this resolution is intended to confer.

Mr. SMILLE was in favor of the amendment for one reason. He was ready at all times to grant commerce every necessary protection. But, by adopting this resolution we pledge ourselves, without inquiring into the necessity, to extend further protection. No doubt further protection will be required. But he thought it premature to make any pledge until all the documents connected with the subject were before the House.

Mr. MITCHILL suggested the propriety of amending the original resolution, by inserting after the word "law," "if necessary." This would render the resolution conditional. To the resolution he was a friend. For, when the aspect and extent of the United States were considered, it must be evident to every man that we were a commercial people. The bulk and extensiveness of our produce required vessels to carry it to foreign countries. The carriage required protection. The Government must of course give protection. With respect to the Mediterranean expedition, no plan under the Government had been better devised; and he had no hesitation to say that if the Mediterranean trade required further protection, he would be for making further appropriations of the public moneys.

Mr. NICHOLSON said he could not agree to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, as by adopting it we should do nothing. How does the matter now stand? Congress has put into the hands of the President six frigates, which he had used for the public service in the Mediterranean. This was not a fit time to express his opinion on the propriety of the measures of the Executive. But when a fit occasion did offer, he would have no hesitation to say the President had done right.

To return to the point—the President had now six frigates. If we agree to the resolution, do we not pledge ourselves to increase this force?

One squadron had been sent to the Mediterranean; another was in operation to go there, he understood. This was all right. But there followed no necessity from these circumstances to pledge ourselves to increase the force.

We were not even acquainted with the sentiments of the President on this point. His communications did not inform us that he desired a larger force. If he did desire it, he would say so. He had, on the contrary, recommended a reduction of the Army and Navy; and to desire an augmentation of the latter, would be, in the same breath, to say one thing and another.

Mr. EURIST.—The President, in his communications, has informed us that he has hitherto acted on the defensive. The simple question now is, whether he shall be empowered to take offensive steps. This has no relation, therefore, to an increase of the force, nor shall we, by adopting it, pledge ourselves to such effect.

Mr. GILES was happy that the discussion was one more of words than of principles. He perfectly coincided with the gentleman from Maryland, who had moved the amendment, in his general sentiments. It would be wrong in this House prematurely to pledge itself for an increase of naval force. But the words of the resolution do not relate to the quantum of force, but entirely to the measures to be taken with any force. When the President is authorized further and more effectually to protect our trade, it was not said that we will give him four or six additional frigates; but merely that he is to have means, more or less, which shall be adequate to make offensive operations against those who shall make offensive operations against us.

It was well understood that he was for keeping the Navy within proper bounds; but if ever there was a case where it was required, this was the case; and he acknowledged that he was for empowering the President to authorize, not merely a dismantlement of a vessel, but her capture.

Mr. S. SMITH said it was true that six frigates had been given to the President; but it was also true that, when given, they were contemplated chiefly as a nursery for our seamen, in which view they were directed to be only two-thirds manned. Would gentlemen contend that it was fit they should go out in this insufficient state? By the prescriptions of the law, the President deemed himself bound. Already the whole number of seamen authorized by law are employed on board four frigates; and for the want of hands the second squadron cannot be fitted out. The time of the first would expire in one year from their departure. It was, therefore, absolutely necessary that there should be more seamen.

The question was then taken on Mr. NICHOLSON'S amendment, and lost.

When the original motion of Mr. SMITH was carried.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. DANA, Mr. MITCHILL, and Mr. JONES, do prepare and bring in the same.

DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

The following motion, made by Mr. S. SMITH, was then taken up, viz :

Resolved, That so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, as imposes a discriminating duty of tonnage between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, and between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, ought to be repealed; such repeal to take effect whenever the President shall be informed that the discriminating duties of foreign nations, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the commerce of the United States, shall have been abolished.

Mr. GRISWOLD hoped the gentleman who had made the motion before the committee, would assign the grounds on which it was made. The acts imposing discriminating duties had long existed, with great and good effect to our commercial interests. He wished to know what effects would flow from a revocation of those restrictions, and whether the proposed measure would not operate to the prejudice of the United States. In its effects, the Eastern States would be particularly interested, and the more especially at this period when, from the consequences likely to ensue from peace, our ships may be thrown out of employment.

Mr. S. SMITH assured the gentleman from Connecticut that if the measure he proposed had, in his opinion, the least tendency to injure the commerce of the country, he should not have advocated it, as well from a regard to the deep stake he himself held, as from a regard to the interests of his constituents. The system of discriminating duties was a wise one in the early existence of the Government; our own shipping was then unequal to the carrying of our produce. The discrimination operated as a charm in producing a rapid extension of shipping beyond the most sanguine expectation.

Our trade remained in this situation until the formation of the British Treaty. By that instrument Great Britain was permitted to lay countervailing duties, and these had been so imposed as, in time of peace, to destroy the advantages attached to our shipping over theirs. The effects of this regulation were not immediately felt by us. England was at war, and her freights were charged with war insurance, while ours were exempt from such charges. Under these circumstances English bottoms could not enter into competition with American, as the war insurances of the former exceeded the inconveniences imposed on the latter.

But peace being now restored, British ships will have such an advantage over our ships, that no man will ship tobacco, rice, or any other bulky articles in American bottoms.

The effect of the countervailing duties of England would be, that an American ship carrying tobacco to England would pay eighteen shillings sterling more on the hogshead than a British ship. The usual freight of a hogshead was thirty-five shillings. The difference, therefore, constituted more than one-half.

Our situation was still worse in relation to France. Of the restrictive acts of that Government he could not give a precise idea; but he was enabled to state, from a conversation had with a gentleman from that country, high in office, that so decided a preference was given to her over foreign bottoms, that a duty of ten livres upon every hundred weight of tobacco was laid on the latter, which was equivalent to one hundred and twenty livres on a hogshead. He further understood that six per cent. difference was imposed upon all other articles. Peace being now restored, French vessels will enter our ports, and become the carriers to France of all our productions.

How were these effects, so alarming to our trade, to be met? He replied that it was by taking off our discriminating duties, and by placing our merchants on equal terms with the merchants of other nations.

And, sir, said Mr. S., have we not enterprise; have we not capital, to hold an honorable, a successful competition with the whole world? No man that knows the character of an American merchant will doubt his ability to sustain such a competition. The discriminating duties, once useful, have ceased to be so. Our shipping has increased, and we now want more to enter into the ports of other nations, than that other nations should enter into ours. We are willing to free trade from its trammels. Let the trade be taken by those who can carry the cheapest. As a merchant, he was convinced that we could carry cheaper than any other nation. Our materials for ship-building were at hand; were cheaper, and we could navigate our ships with fewer seamen than any other nation.

The crisis required that we should take efficient measures. Unless such measures be taken, our commercial rivals will seize the sweets offered by the present opportunity. It was true that in two years the British Treaty would expire. But he understood that the British Ministry demurred to the construction which considered that part of the treaty under which countervailing duties were imposed as expiring at that time.

Mr. GRISWOLD declared himself not satisfied with the explanation made by the gentleman from Maryland. It was certainly desirable to secure the carrying of our bulky articles in our own ships; and if the resolution would have this effect, he should be decidedly for it. But he could not discern such to be the effect. With regard to England, it was true that tobacco was there charged with a heavy duty; but it was well known that England consumed but a small portion of what was sent there—the rest was exported, and a drawback of all duties allowed. As to the great mass of this article, therefore, it was not charged any more than it would have been charged, had it been directly exported to other countries.

For his part, he firmly believed, that our carrying trade would be effectually injured by allowing a free trade, whereby English ships would enter our ports upon the same terms with our own ships. It was well known, that before the war, the tobacco imported into France had been farmed out by the Government, and that it had been a great source of revenue. He was persuaded that France would not permit that article to be free.

From these and other considerations, Mr. G. declared himself unprepared to decide upon a question of so great importance. He was not prepared to say what would be the effects of the principle offered to the House, particularly as the resolution does not say, in the event contemplated, who shall decide, whether the President or Congress.

Mr. S. SMITH agreed with the gentleman from Connecticut that the great bulk of our exports required an uncommonly large tonnage. But this was an argument why we should secure this important object even if we lost the carriage of the imports of other nations.

The gentleman had referred to the mass of shipping in the Eastern States; but he would inform the House that the Middle States were competent to carrying their own produce. The gentleman was mistaken in one of his deductions, viz: that which respected our merchants deriving no inconvenience from English duties, as to the quantity of tobacco exported from England on which a drawback was allowed. He affirmed the injury to be great. For he would ask what merchant would like to export to England under the uncertainty of his exporting his produce again to other countries?

The gentleman was also mistaken in his allusion to the farmers-general of France. They did not monopolise that article. Every man had a right to go there with tobacco. They were only the venders of it. The gentleman was, therefore, further mistaken, when he said our merchants could not compete with French merchants.

Mr. S. was anxious that the earliest attention of Congress should be paid to this important subject. France had not at present vessels to carry our produce; availing ourselves of the situation in which she was at present placed, we might by this proposition gain her assent to the principles of a free trade, whereby a large share of our carrying trade would be preserved, which otherwise might be lost. Unless the opportunity that now offered was immediately seized it might never return.

Mr. GILES had at first thought the resolution a very plain one; but he was almost induced to think differently of it on finding gentlemen, who were deeply interested in its effects, holding contrary opinions. As to himself, Mr. G. said, he did not feel a very lively interest on the subject. The Southern States, in a pecuniary view, would not be directly affected by it, as their interests would not be materially promoted or impaired, whether their productions were carried by foreign merchants or by those of other States. Not but that they would greatly prefer the latter mode.

From the remarks which had fallen from the gentleman from Connecticut, he appeared entirely to mistake the effects of the resolution.

Mr. G. believed the countervailing duty laid by the British to be unauthorized by the treaty. Taking our duties as the basis they had countervailed them, and applying the countervailing standard to separate and distinct articles, they had imposed heavy duties upon them, below, however, the maximum; giving up, as they said, a right, and granting what they called a favor. The result was the preference of British bottoms over American, as stated by the gentleman from Maryland.

Under the British Treaty, Britain was authorized to lay countervailing duties, but we were prohibited from countervailing them. The only question, then, was, whether we would patiently submit to the present inequality, whereby nearly the whole of our carrying trade might be destroyed, or take our chance in an equal competition.

The ideas of the gentleman as to dispatch were certainly correct. No time ought to be lost consistently with deliberation. It was not, however, the desire of Mr. G. to be precipitate. The moment was propitious; we ought to seize it. France is now without shipping, but she has great resources, and may, unless we adopt decisive measures, buy from us those very vessels with which we now carry our own produce, for the purpose of carrying it for us. Hence, it was desirable that an early decision should be had. If delayed till the next session of Congress, or even for six months, great mischief might be done, as he presumed the laying up our merchant vessels for six months will be nearly equivalent to a destruction of them.

Mr. GRISWOLD offered some additional remarks; when, on motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, the Committee rose, leaving the question undecided.

WEDNESDAY, December 16.

. Another member, to wit: BENJAMIN HUGER, from South Carolina, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, accompanying an annual return, ending the ninth instant, containing an abstract of all the returns made to him by the Collectors for the different ports in the United States, pursuant to the "Act for the relief and protection of American seamen;" also, extracts from the communications received from the agents in foreign countries for the relief of American seamen; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The Committee of Elections made a further report, stating certain members to be duly elected; and further stated, that in consequence of the erection of the Mississippi Territory, under the ordinance of Congress, that Territory was entitled to a Delegate when the Territory was entitled to a Legislature. This period having arrived, the committee report an opinion that NARSWORTHY HUNTER be considered as a Delegate, with the right of deliberating, but not of voting.

Mr. MILLEDGE could not agree to the report, as by so doing he would vote for a measure that would affect the sovereignty of Georgia. He, therefore, moved a reference to a Committee of the Whole, in order to have the subject discussed. Agreed to, and made the order for Friday.

RATIO OF REPRESENTATION.

The House, according to the order of the day, proceeded to consider the first resolution reported yesterday from the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That the apportionment of Representatives amongst the several States, according to the second enumeration of the people, ought to be in a ratio of one Representative for every thirty-three thousand persons in each State."

Mr. GRISWOLD remarked that the effect of adopting this resolution would be an increase of members in that House; that the number would amount to nearly one hundred and fifty. He was of opinion that the present House was sufficiently numerous for every correct purpose, as well of legislation, as for obtaining all desirable information from the people. Should an augmentation be made, the consequences would be an increase of expense, and business would inevitably be protracted. He moved, therefore, to strike out the words "thirty-three," meaning, if they were stricken out, to propose the substitution of a larger number.

On this motion a desultory debate ensued, in which Messrs. GRISWOLD, S. SMITH, NICHOLSON, GILES, BAYARD, ALSTON, ELMER, EUSTIS, SPRIGG, and other gentlemen, took part.

Mr. GRISWOLD stood alone in advocating an apportionment of one member to every 40,000 persons.

Messrs. GILES and BAYARD were for one member for every 30,000.

Messrs. S. SMITH, NICHOLSON, and EUSTIS, were for one member for 33,000.

Mr. ALLSTON was in favor of one representative for every 31,000.

The preferences avowed by the several speakers, appeared to arise from the application of that divisor to the State from which each member came, which left the least fraction.

Some gentlemen, however, declared, and particularly Mr. GILES, that he had made no calculation, and that his preference of the smallest ratio proposed was the preference of principle.

Those in favor of a small ratio argued that, though the expense attending the compensation of the members might be somewhat increased; yet, that it would be trifling compared with the great advantages that would result from a larger representation; that such a representation would be productive of true economy, as it would oppose all extravagant expenditure of money; that the weight of expense incurred by the Government did not arise from the expense of the civil list, which formed but a speck in the mass of expenditure. That it was important to this Government to adopt those measures which would insure the respect and the confidence of the people; that this end would be best attained by each Representative being familiarly acquainted with the interests of his constituents; and that this could only be the case, when the number of his constituents were limited within certain bounds. It was true that it had been said that a body of more than one hundred, even though it be composed of philosophers, was a mob; but it was replied that the long experience of this country had proved the reverse, for that many of the State Legislatures consisted of more members.

These ideas were but feebly opposed. The diversity of opinion expressed, chiefly arose from a division of the House on the ratios of thirty thousand and thirty three-thousand. The former was advocated principally from a regard to Delaware and Rhode Island, which, by its adoption, would have each two Representatives, instead of one, if a higher ratio were preferred.

During the discussion, it was moved to strike out the word "three;" leaving thirty thousand as the ratio. This motion was lost—yeas 43, nays 46.

Mr. BAYARD then moved to strike out "thirty-three," leaving the resolution blank, in order that it might be filled up with such number as should be agreeable to the House.

This motion was opposed chiefly by Mr. NICHOLSON and Mr. EUSTIS, who were of opinion that the progressive increase of the members would be sufficiently large on the ratio of thirty-three thousand persons to a member. They were also further in favor of this number as it left the fewest fractions. The only two States much injured by it would be Delaware and North Carolina; whereas if the ratio was increased to thirty-five thousand, New Jersey would have a fraction of 31,000; Delaware of 26,000; Maryland of 30,000; Georgia of 23,000; and Kentucky of 29,000.

On the question being taken for striking out "thirty-three," there rose only thirty-one members. It was therefore declared to be lost.

The question was then taken on the original motion, and carried without a division, and a committee of three members appointed to bring in a bill conformably thereto.

THURSDAY, December 17.

Another member, to wit: DANIEL HEISTER, from Maryland, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying two statements of the importations in American and foreign vessels, from the first day of October, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, to the thirtieth day of September, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine; also, similar statements, from the first day of October, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, to the thirtieth of September, one thousand eight hundred, inclusive; which were read and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, enclosing a report made to them by the Secretary of the Treasury, and a statement of the proceedings which have been authorized by the Board since their report of the twenty-eighth of November, one thousand eight hundred; which were read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDOLPH, a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, informed the House that certain documents just directed to be printed, owing to the state of the manufacture in this place, could not be printed in less than twenty days; during which time the proceedings of the committee would be arrested. He, therefore, moved a committee be appointed to devise a plan for expediting the printing work of the House.

A committee of three, viz: Messrs. RANDOLPH, NICHOLSON, and L. R. MORRIS, was appointed.

It was moved that the House do go into a Committee of the Whole on the Apportionment bill.

Mr. BAYARD moved to postpone its consideration till Monday.

After a short debate, the question of postponement was lost—yeas 39, nays 45.

The motion to go into a Committee of the Whole on the above bill was then withdrawn, under the understanding that it would be renewed to-morrow. The bill was ordered to be printed.

The committee, to whom was referred the resolution for a new apportionment of Representatives among the several States, reported a bill, which gives to the States the following members, viz: New Hampshire, five; Massachusetts, seventeen; Vermont, four; Rhode Island, two; Connecticut, seven; New York, seventeen; New Jersey, six; Pennsylvania, eighteen; Delaware, one; Maryland, eight; Virginia, twenty-two; North Carolina, twelve; South Carolina, eight; Georgia, four; Kentucky, six; Tennessee, three. The bill was read a second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole this day.

FRIDAY, December 18.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. RANDOLPH, chairman of the committee appointed to see what alterations were necessary to expedite the printing business of the House, reported that the committee thought it expedient to request the Heads of the Departments to attend and inspect the printing of all such documents, reports, and statements, as are directed by law to be annually laid before the House; and that it was necessary that a printer to the House be appointed, who should be responsible for the faithful and prompt execution of all business confided to him by order of the House.

Mr. GRISWOLD wished the report altered to a resolution; to the first part of it he should agree, but doubted whether the latter part would be concurred in. He did not think it sufficient or expedient to appoint but one; the business would require more, particularly at the close of the session. He could see no reason for altering the mode in which the printing business was now and had ever been done; it now lies with the Clerk, who is empowered to employ as many persons as he pleases or deems expedient. If such printer should be appointed, he will become an officer of the House; he will not be responsible to the Speaker. We have officers enough already; it is needless to multiply.

Mr. RANDOLPH said the committee had considered these objections; but, he believed, sufficient reasons might be offered to convince the House of the expediency of this measure. If one be appointed, he will know his duty and be prepared; he will employ as many hands as he wishes. Had there been one appointed by the House last session, he would have been on the spot now, fully prepared promptly to execute the orders of the House; nor should we have such delay as that by which we are now unfortunately troubled.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—We have but few printers in this vicinity, nor is it probable their number will be soon increased. The printing for the House is said to be worth $4,000 per annum: if one be appointed for that purpose he will have everything in readiness, and be responsible for his faithful duty.

Mr. S. SMITH thought a printer thus appointed might perform a considerable part of his duty previous to each session: to many documents he might attend. Mr. S. wished such printer appointed as a permanent officer.

DECEMBER, 1801.

H. OF R.

Mr. LOWNDES.—If he thought such officer necessary he should not oppose the measure, but at present he did not think such appointment necessary. He conceived the Clerk to be responsible to the House; that it was his duty to attend to the printing; that he could employ whom and as many as he pleased. Whence, then, the necessity of such appointment? Besides, such printer will become an officer of this House, must have a salary, and will be called the printer of the House: and, if printer of a paper, whatever sentiments might be advanced in such paper would perhaps be considered as the sentiments of the House.

Mr. EUSTIS considered it altogether unnecessary, disadvantageous, and troublesome.

The first was carried: that relating to the appointment of a printer not carried; about twenty only rising in favour of it.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the second enumeration.

Mr. MACON (Speaker) moved to strike out "thirty-three," the ratio fixed by the bill, for the purpose of inserting "thirty."

Mr. M. observed that it did not appear from the different ideas expressed by different gentlemen, that any material inconvenience would result from the increased number of members that would be created by the ratio of thirty thousand being adopted. Whereas on the ground of principle a great benefit would flow from it. In his opinion, to secure the confidence of the people in the Government, it was essential to lessen the districts as much as possible, that the elector might know the elected. At present, particularly in North Carolina, they were so large that a voter depended more upon the opinion of others than upon his own information. The ratio of thirty thousand would not introduce into the House more than one hundred and sixty members, which number did not equal that of the members in several of the State Legislatures, of which no complaints had been made, and from which no inconvenience had arisen. He felt particularly for Delaware, which would be severely affected by the ratio in the bill.

Mr. GILES hoped the motion would obtain. As far as respected the State of Virginia, he felt little or no anxiety. But he, on general principles, preferred the smallest ratio. It was an essential principle of a Republican Government that the people voting should know whom they vote for; that the elector should be well acquainted with the elected. To insure this effect the districts should be small. He was aware of the impossibility of reaching this point precisely: but it was our duty to approach it as nearly as possible. Though, in relation to the situation of Delaware, he did not subscribe fully to the ideas of some gentlemen, as the case was an extreme one, and he knew the impropriety of relying upon such case, as the reasoning from an extreme generally led to an extreme, yet he thought the relative circumstances of Delaware and Virginia, as stated, to be correct; for it was a fact that Virginia, entitled to twenty-two Representatives, was not so much affected by any given fraction, as Delaware, entitled to but one Representative.

But the reply to the inequality of her representation here is, that she has two Representatives in the Senate; and it is inferred that she will hence derive a larger weight in the Union. Such was the theory of the thing. But what was the result of experience? Mr. G. said, he had once supposed that the small States would have an undue advantage over the large States. His opinion had since altered. All the small States were surrounded and compressed by large States, and derived their political sympathies from them. It was true, the small States had each two votes in the Senate. Yet, what superior advantage have they in the Government generally? He was, therefore, clearly of opinion that the claims of the small States to the largest representation that could be constitutionally given them, ought not to be affected by their representation in the Senate. The fact was that this House was the basis of confidence in the Government. We had heard much about an alarm, about disorganization, and the disposition of large States to swallow up the rights of all the other States. He would ask, whether the adoption of a large ratio would lessen this clamor, promote the general confidence, and increase the stability of the Government?

Mr. JONES hoped the amendment would prevail. There was not a doubt but that the small States would be materially affected by the ratio in the bill. It was true, that, according to the theory of our Government, the members of that House did not represent the States. But, what was the fact? In truth, our representation was that of absolute locality. Can I, said Mr. J., represent as effectually Massachusetts, or Vermont, as Pennsylvania?

Mr. VAN NESS declared himself to be uninfluenced by local considerations, or particular inconveniences. If we attempted to avoid them by the adoption of any ratio, we should be mistaken. The inequality of States could not be remedied. If a remedy was sought, it must be found in the Senate. The large States had not that exclusive weight which had been stated. If the number of the large States in this House should overbear the smaller States, they would find their protection in the Senate. The fractional loss, so much dwelt on, was not a loss to the State, it was only a loss to that part of the State which was unrepresented, and the loss would be the same to a larger State, if its unrepresented fraction was equally great.

Mr. V. N. said, it had always been his desire to consult the wishes of the people and to conform to them. He considered those wishes as solemnly expressed in the Constitution, which had decided that the ratio should not be less than thirty thousand, and in the law passed immediately after the adoption of the Constitution, fixing the ratio at thirty-three thousand.

As to the experience of the States, so often appealed to, he would state that of his own. The constitution of New York originally fixed the representation in one branch at three hundred, and in the other at one hundred and fifty. After suffering the inconveniences of so large a legislative body, a convention had been called, which reduced the one branch to one hundred and fifty, and the other to thirty-two members.

It was the opinion of some gentlemen that the essential principle of our Government was the equal representation of the States in the Senate. This was a mistaken opinion. The federalism of the Government might have been as well preserved by an unequal representation in the Senate. The feature was not the offspring of principle, but of concession. If we looked to antiquity, we would observe the smaller States of a Confederation always inferior to the larger; and he recollected one case of a Confederation, in which one State was entitled to three, another to two, and the third to one representative.

Mr. SMILE heartily concurred in opinion with the gentleman from New York, that we ought not to respect local feelings, but that we ought to go upon general grounds. Possessing these principles, we still know how difficult it is to do complete justice. For himself he would be satisfied with the ratio of thirty-three, if he could not obtain that of thirty thousand. He was in favor of a large representation, because he relied on that for safety and economy. For, when he considered the great powers of the other branches of the Government, (powers, in the opinion of some men, too great,) he thought it was their duty to impart to that House all the Constitutional power that could be conferred. This would enable the House to resist all encroachments attempted to be made upon it.

Mr. BACON said that, for himself, he was satisfied with the present ratio, as it stood in the bill. This was the ratio which had been adopted when our numbers were much less than they now are; that it did not appear but that it had given general satisfaction; and that no other inconveniences had accrued than such as might be expected to follow from the adoption of any other ratio whatever. It would seem to be rather unnatural, and the reverse of what was contemplated by those who enacted the Constitution, as our numbers increase, to lessen the ratio of representation. He was, therefore, against striking out the number thirty-three, with a view to insert a lower number.

A divisor of thirty-three thousand would now give a House consisting of at least one hundred and forty members, which, even on the present ratio, must soon become not only too expensive, but unwieldy. It had been repeatedly urged that the present ratio leaves a very large fraction to the State of Delaware. This, it was admitted, was matter of regret; but that, let what ratio might be adopted, such fractional parts must be expected to fall somewhere; that such fractions would be likely to vary, from time to time, and shift from State to State, as the population may increase and vary in the several States. And Mr. B. did not conceive that the particular case of Delaware, hard as it might seem, furnished a sufficient reason for altering an entire system.

As to what had been urged of the disadvantage to which Electors were subjected in large districts, of not knowing the characters of their Representatives and candidates, Mr. B. observed that this was a disadvantage which was lessening with rapidity from year to year, and from one election to another; that to whatever inconvenience electors may heretofore have been subjected by the want of a knowledge of their candidate, from this inconvenience they are already in a great measure relieved; and it must, in a very short time, entirely cease to exist. If any inconvenience of this kind still remains, by an election or two more, it would be entirely removed. It had been urged that Delaware had but one Representative, and every State ought to have two. But, why two, Mr. B. queried, rather than three? It is true, that two are better than one; and three are better than either one or two; for, as we have long since been told, "a three-fold cord is not easily broken."

Mr. B. concluded by saying that, as thirty-three thousand was the ratio which had been adopted when our population was much less than it now is; and as it has been practised upon without any inconvenience or general dissatisfaction, he was unwilling to risk the uncertain consequences of an innovation at this particular time.

Mr. T. MORRIS was of opinion that the arguments drawn from the representation in the Senate had nothing to do with this question. The House had a Constitutional duty to perform, that was highly interesting. The only question is, How it shall be performed? The people ought to be fully represented; that is, the number of their representatives should be increased until that number became inconvenient for the transaction of business. He had never been a friend to an enormous Legislature; such as that in France, a mob convention. He thought the idea incorrect that this House should acquire a weight that might cause it to bear down the other branch of the Legislature. He hoped, if any such attempt should be made, that body would have sufficient spirit to resist it; and he trusted there would always be firmness enough here to resist any encroachment attempted.

As to the present ratio guiding, he did not think that the House should be governed by any uniform rule. They ought, on the contrary, to be governed by the existing circumstances. Not believing that any inconvenience would arise from the augmented representation on the ratio of thirty thousand, he would be in favor of it from the reasons he had assigned.

Mr. DENNIS did not rise to say anything new on the subject; but merely, as he had altered his mind since the business was before the House, to assign some of the reasons which had influenced him. He was now in favor of the ratio of thirty thousand. His first impressions were against it from an apprehension that the increased numbers of the House would increase expense, and produce disorder. But he acknowledged himself convinced by the arguments which had fallen from the gentleman from Virginia, which he thought counterbalanced his previous apprehension. Mr. D. thought it all important to preserve an equilibrium between the different departments of the Government, and he was convinced that this would be best effected by making the representation in this House as large as the Constitution permitted, and convenience justified. If we expected to retain the confidence of the people, it was necessary to increase the Representative branch; for it would be in vain to look for that confidence necessary to give it a proper portion of energy, unless there existed a sympathy between the elector and the elected.

Mr. RANDOLPH hoped the amendment would not obtain. The difference between the effects of the two ratios was not very important; but it was highly important that a doctrine so heretical and improper as that which had been avowed, should be exploded on its first annunciation. He meant that doctrine which considered this House as the Representatives of the people. When the Constitution was formed, two great difficulties presented themselves. The large States refused to confer on the Government greater powers than those it enjoyed, which deeply affected their wealth and their numbers, unless, according to the ratio of their numbers, they should participate in the administration of it; while the smaller States withheld their concurrence, unless their sovereignties were guarantied and protected. These two difficulties were surmounted by the plan of the present Constitution; according to which the members of this House were the Representatives, not of the people, but of the States in proportion to their numbers. This was the theory of the Government for which he must contend.

Mr. R. believed that the strongest objection urged against the adoption of the Constitution, was, that it tended to a consolidation of the States. But when he looked into it with a Federal eye, (and with no other eye could he ever look at it,) he saw the State sovereignties in all its parts acknowledged and protected. Of this, the very bill was itself a proof. For the apportionment was not among the people, but among the States, according to the numbers of each. Believing that this House is the representative of States, it was his opinion that so long as the relative weight of States could be preserved, it was immaterial that each State should be represented by a large number of members.

It was with extreme regret, and some diffidence, Mr. R. said, that he differed from his colleague on this subject. His colleague wished to increase the House to such an extent as to make it the depository of the whole confidence of the people. Mr. R. wished it to possess that confidence so far as related to Federal objects, but no further. Increase it, according to the theory of gentlemen, make it in point of numbers, a British Parliament, or a French Convention, and you will proportionably diminish the confidence of the people in the State governments. They will become feeble barriers against the powers of the General Government; and the people will inquire for what purpose they elect their State Legislatures. Mr. R. believed it to be of infinite importance that the poises of the Government should be preserved; that it should confine itself to Federal objects. His object, therefore, was to preserve on that floor the proportionate weight between the several States which the Constitution had fixed.

Had any objection been made to the old Congress under the Confederation, that was federally organized, for the want of talents or integrity? No. The only objection was, that they wanted power. Had the public affairs been conducted with less ability than they are at present? He had neither heard, nor did he believe that they had.

Mr. R. concluded, by making some remarks on the score of convenience, similar to those already stated.

Mr. MITCHILL, in a speech of some length, supported the ratio of thirty thousand.

Mr. S. SMITH felt indifferent whether the ratio of thirty-three, or that of thirty thousand, were adopted; but felt anxious that justice should be done to the State of Maryland. He understood that radical errors existed in the numbers given to that State; that in Harford county there were returned only three thousand slaves, whereas there ought to have been returned eighteen thousand; and that in Cecil there had been returned nine thousand, instead of fifteen thousand. He hoped, in order to have these errors corrected, the Committee would rise, that the original returns in the office of State might be examined.

This motion gave rise to a conversation of some length, in which on one side the impropriety and injustice of making an apportionment under the existing errors, and without the return from Tennessee, were argued; and, on the other side, the great inconvenience of delay, and the inability of the House to obtain a correction of errors, which, if attempted in one instance, might be attempted in many.

Mr. VAN NESS informed the Committee that the return from Tennessee was received at the office of State, and that it made the population of that State amount to ninety-two thousand free inhabitants, and thirteen thousand slaves.

It was ultimately agreed that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again; which was granted.

MONDAY, December 21.

A petition of sundry inhabitants of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, was presented to the House and read, praying that a law may pass to authorize the Corporation of the said town more effectually to enforce the collection of taxes for corporate purposes.

Also, a petition of sundry inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the said District of Columbia, praying that Congress will adopt such regulations for the purchase and sale of victuals and provision, as may tend to establish and support a market in the said city.

Ordered, That the said petitions be referred to the committee appointed on the eighth instant, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations or amendments may be necessary in the existing government and laws of the District of Columbia, and to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the joint committee appointed, on the seventh instant, to take into consideration a statement made by the Secretary of the Senate, respecting books and maps purchased pursuant to a late act of Congress, and to make report respecting the future arrangement of the same, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of State be directed to cause to be furnished to each member of the two Houses of Congress, a copy of the laws of the sixth Congress:"

It was resolved in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a report and sundry statements, prepared in pursuance of the act "Supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Treasury Department;' which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying two statements, marked (A) and (B) relating to the Internal Revenue of the United States; also, a letter to him from the Commissioner of the Revenue, explanatory thereof; which were read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for extending the privilege of franking to the Delegate, for the time being, from the Mississippi Territory; and for making the same compensation for his travel and attendance, that is allowed the Representatives of the United States.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. DAVIS, Mr. TILLINGHAST, and Mr. JOSIAH SMITH, do prepare and bring in the same.

On motion, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be authorized to report by bill, or bills, or otherwise, on all such matters as shall from time to time be referred to them by the House.

A petition of Peter Lee, a free negro, was presented to the House and read, praying relief, in consideration of the loss of an eye, and other injuries received, whilst a soldier in the American Army during the Revolutionary war with Great Britain.

A motion being made, and the question put, that the said petition be referred to the Committee of Claims, to examine and report thereon, it passed in the negative.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying two letters from the Commissioners of the City of Washington, and sundry documents exhibiting a state of their receipts and expenditures, and the progress made in the public buildings, from the 18th day of November 1800, to the 18th of November, 1801; which were read and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

DELEGATE FROM MISSISSIPPI.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the report of the Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Narworthy Hunter, who has appeared as a Delegate from the Territory of the United States known by the name of the Mississippi Territory.

Mr. MILLEDGE spoke forcibly, and with considerable eloquence against agreeing to the report of the committee; he said it was not a matter of private but of general concern—that Georgia had jurisdiction over that Territory; to prove this, he called for the reading of the memorial of Georgia to the Legislature of the Union.

[The memorial was extremely long, and was read but in part.]

Mr. M. insisted on the right of Georgia to the soil; he would assert to that body and to the world that she had never given up that right; and that therefore the laws that had been passed by Congress for the government of that Territory were void, and the gentleman elected as a delegate to Congress by the Legislature of that Territory had no right to a seat in the House. Gentlemen might say what they please of the expediency of Congress making laws for the government of that Territory, yet that expediency must yield to justice and to just claims; depriving Georgia of her command over that soil and over the people of that soil, was a glaring violation of right. Commissioners had been appointed to settle the dispute between the United States and Georgia; those commissioners are here, and probably it will not be long before those claims are adjusted; he hoped and trusted no further proceedings would take place till the dispute was completely settled.

Mr. BAYARD.—The gentleman from Georgia appeared to mistake the object of the report of the select committee; that committee was appointed to examine the credentials of Mr. Hunter, and to see whether the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory had a right, by the law of Congress regulating that government, to send a delegate, to exercise here the right of debating, but not of voting; it was not to admit into the Union a new State, or to erect a new State within the bounds of another. The law of Congress, establishing the government of that Territory, declares that when in that Territory there shall be such a number of inhabitants, they shall have a House of Representatives and a Legislature; and that when their inhabitants shall have increased to such a number, the Legislature may appoint a delegate to Congress, with the right of debating, but not of voting. It is not now a question whether a new State shall be erected, but whether this member be duly chosen. Nor are the interests of Georgia at all affected: the fifth section of the law establishing this Government expressly declares that nothing in the law for establishing a temporary government there, shall in any manner affect any claims of the State of Georgia to that soil. Commissioners are appointed on the part of the United States and Georgia to settle the dispute between the two Governments; but till, those disputes shall be settled, shall the inhabitants of that Territory be without a government? No sir, it is not a matter of discretion with us; we are bound by a positive law of Congress. If the gentleman was urgent against Mr. HUNTER's taking his seat, the only way to effect it is, by repealing the law of Congress establishing the Government of the Mississippi Territory.

Mr. DAVIS.—The House have no business to meddle, in this case, with the claims of the United States, or of Georgia, to that Territory; we have only to examine the credentials of the member, and to see whether the Legislature, in conformity to the act of Congress, were authorized, or not, to send a delegate. If that act of Congress be unconstitutional, it must be repealed by the Senate and House; yet, as it now is, we are bound to but one decision on this subject.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—He thought gentlemen did not treat the member from Georgia with due candor and respect. It should be remembered that Georgia had ever protested against the laws relative to the Mississippi Territory. It was the duty of that gentleman, as a member from the State of Georgia, to dissent; constructions might be put on silence. The United States had arrogated the power of governing that Territory, at the same time saying that such assumption of power should not affect any claims of Georgia; but did not this very assumption of a right to govern, prejudge claims? We are told the commissioners are on the eve of settling the dispute; let us wait till this be accomplished. Mr. R. motioned that the committee rise.

Mr. CLAIBORNE.—He thought it right in the gentleman from Georgia to dissent; it was to be expected; he did not rise to censure him. He did not conceive that any gentleman in the House wished, in this matter, to do anything that would prejudice the interest or claims of Georgia. The assumption of a power to give laws to the Mississippi Territory arose from the necessity of the thing, and from benevolence to the inhabitants; he would not suffer an infraction of the Constitution for the world; no, not to save a world. [The Chairman called him to order: the question was now on the Committee's rising.] Mr. C. said he did not know but he might be out of order, but if he was, he believed others had been in the same situation. He wished to express his opinions on the subject in common with others. It should be considered that the delegate from the Mississippi Territory would have no right to vote, but only to debate; he would be only a sting, but without poison. We ought, moreover, to oblige our brethren of that southern hemisphere; we ought to hear their statements, attend to their wants, &c.

Mr. DANA.—He was for the Committee's rising. It had been usual to suffer the reports of the Committee of Elections to lie on the table, and if no protest or complaint were entered, nothing further was done with them, and the members kept their seats. In the case of the Northwestern and Indiana Territories, they were obliged to inquire, if it was the first time, whether there was a right to send a delegate; such is the situation now of the member from the Mississippi Territory; the records show their right to send, the report states that this delegate is duly chosen. Let the report lie on the table, and the member keep his seat.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—He was not in favor of the Committee's rising. It was extremely unpleasant to the delegate from the Mississippi Territory to remain in this situation; he himself claimed a seat in that House, not as a matter of favor but of right; and this House had not the power of depriving him of this right, without repealing the act of Congress establishing a government over that Territory. Some gentlemen have said that the rights of Georgia will be affected by the admittance of this member to a seat; such certainly could not be the case; if the claims of Georgia are at all affected, it is done already by act of Congress; yet, for his part, he did not consider the claims of Georgia as affected or injured. Nor ought we to wait the decision of the commissioners: that decision may take place in a month, and perhaps will not these six months.

Mr. MACON.—There ought to be some petition or statement of facts presented by the member from Georgia, or some other person, to justify a discussion at this time, or to prevent the delegate from taking his seat. He wished his right and his credentials treated as those of any other member. He agreed with the gentlemen from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) that it were better for the committee to rise, without leave to sit again; the member would then be entitled to his seat and his pay, till it should be shown that he has no claim to them.

Mr. BAYARD.—He did not agree with the Speaker; the face of the report of the select committee gives sufficient cause for a decision of the Committee of the Whole. The gentleman from Georgia opposes the decision of the select committee; and it is due to the member from Georgia, and to the delegate, to have the opinion of the House—to have a prompt decision. The mere question is, whether he has been duly elected; not whether the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory had a right to elect him. Gentlemen have said we are prejudicing the claims of Georgia, that their rights are implicated in this step; they have said that the act of Congress establishing a government was an assumption of power; not so: by the Spanish Treaty that Territory was ceded to the United States; the inhabitants were without a government; they petitioned Congress for some form of government. What was to be done? The interposition of Congress arose ex necessitate rei: It was no assumption of power or assertion of claims. It was a necessary establishment of a temporary government, to continue while there was necessity. He was for an immediate decision.

The report of the select committee was agreed to. Mr. MILLEDGE wished the yeas and nays, even if he stood alone. They were taken, and stood, yeas 77, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, James A. Bayard, Phaniel Bishop, Thomas Boude, Robert Brown, William Butler, Thomas Claiborne, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, John Condit, Richard Cutts, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, Thomas T. Davis, John Dennis, Lucas Elmendorf, Ebenezer Elmer, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Edwin Gray, Andrew Gregg, Roger Griswold, John A. Hanna, Daniel Heister, Joseph Heister, William Helms, Joseph Hemphill, Archibald Henderson, William H. Hill, William Hodge, David Holmes, Benjamin Huger, George Jackson, Thomas Lowndes, Ebenezer Mattoon, Lewis R. Morris, Thomas Morris, James Mott, Thomas Moore, Samuel L. Mitchell, Anthony New, Thomas Newton, jr., Joseph Pierce, Elias Perkins, Thomas Plater, Nathan Read, William Shepard, Israel Smith, John Cotton Smith, John Smith, of New York, John Smith, of Virginia, Josiah Smith, Samuel Smith, Henry Southard, Richard Sprigg, John Stanley, Joseph Stanton, jr., John Stewart, John Stratton, John Taliaferro, jr., Benjamin Taliaferro, Samuel Tenney, David Thomas, Thomas Tillinghast, Philip R. Thompson, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, George B. Upham, Philip Van Cortlandt, John P. Van Ness, Joseph B. Varnum, Isaac Van Horn, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, Peleg Wadsworth, Benjamin Walker, Lemuel Williams, and Henry Woods.

NAYS—John Bacon, Samuel J. Cabell, William Eustis, Michael Leib, John Milledge, John Randolph jr., John Smilie, and Richard Stanford.

Ordered, That the residue of the said report of the Committee of the whole House do lie on the table.

TUESDAY, December 22.

Another member, to wit: JOHN RUTLEDGE, from South Carolina, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to retain a further sum on drawbacks, for the expenses incident to the allowance and payment thereof, and in lieu of stamped duties on debentures;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday, the fourth day of January next.

Mr. DAVIS, from the committee appointed yesterday, presented a bill to extend the privilege of franking letters to the Delegate from the Mississippi Territory, and making provision for his compensation; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

Ordered, That Mr. GREGG be added to the committee, appointed on the eighth instant, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations or amendments may be necessary in the existing government and laws of the District of Columbia, in the room of Mr. SUMTER, elected a Senator of the United States for the State of South Carolina.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Lewis, his Secretary, transmitting certain documents supplemental to those already transmitted; and informing the House that two other documents, viz: one respecting the Barbary Powers, and the other exhibiting a view of the officers of the Government of the United States would be transmitted as soon as prepared.

The documents received were: 1. The Census of Tennessee. 2. A letter from Mr. Humphreys respecting Algiers. 3. Extract of a letter from Commodore Dale to the Secretary of the Navy. 4. Extracts of letters from Capt. Sterret. 5. Letters from the Bashaw of Tunis, dated April 15, 1801, and the answer of the President, dated September 9, 1801.

Ordered to be printed

Such papers as respected the Barbary Powers were referred to the committee already appointed on that subject; and the Census of Tennessee was referred to the Committee on the Apportionment bill.

Mr. SMITH called up the resolution, yesterday made by him, for the adjournment of the two Houses from the 26th inst., to the 2d of January.

On which, the question being taken, it was lost—ayes, 23.

An engrossed bill to extend the privilege of franking letters to the Delegate from the Mississippi Territory, and making provision for his compensation, was read the third time and passed.

A Message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to several resolutions, in the form of joint resolutions of the two Houses, "making provision for the disposition and arrangement of the books and maps purchased, pursuant to law, for a Congressional Library;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said resolutions were read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The House according to the standing order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. S. SMITH made the following motion:

Resolved, That it is expedient to fix the Military Peace Establishment."

The motion was opposed by several members as unseasonable. The President in his Message had informed Congress that the Secretary at War would lay before them a statement of the military force of the United States, and of the posts and fortifications requiring protection. Until this information was received, it was thought premature in the House to come to any decision.

After a conversation of some length, Mr. SMITH withdrew his motion.

Mr. GREGG then moved three resolutions.

The first was amended, and agreed to. It was, in substance: That it is expedient that the law for regulating the militia of the United States be revised and amended. This was afterwards confirmed in the House, and a committee of nine appointed.

DECEMBER, 1801.

Library of Congress.

H. OF R.

The second was for the appointment of a committee to inquire whether any, and what, additions are necessary to be made to the military stores of the United States.

The third was for the appointment of a committee to inquire whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to be made in the laws respecting the fortifications of the harbors of the United States.

These two resolutions were agreed to by the Committee, and reported to the House, who postponed the consideration of them till Monday, for the purpose of gaining the information promised on this subject in the President's Message.

Mr. RANDOLPH then moved that the Secretary of War be directed to lay before the House a statement of the present Military Establishment, together with an estimate of all the posts and stations where garrisons will be expedient, and of the number of men requisite for each garrison.

Agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, December 23.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a plan of the lands of the United State within the boundary line northwest of the river Ohio, transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, as referred to in his report respecting the public debt and finances of the United States, received on the twenty-first instant: Whereupon, Ordered, That the said plan be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

A petition was read from sundry inhabitants of the District of Columbia, praying the aid and patronage of Congress in the establishment of a company for building a bridge over the Potomac.

Referred to the Committee on the Territory.

A Message was received from the President, transmitting a more correct return of the Census of Maryland, just received from the Marshal, than that before presented.

On motion, it was Ordered, That the copy of the act of the British Parliament, entitled "An act for carrying into execution the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, concluded between His Majesty and the United States of America," heretofore transmitted to this House by the Secretary of State, be printed for the use of the members of both Houses.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

In Committee of the Whole, the resolutions of the Senate relative to books, maps, &c., were considered. The third resolution was amended so as to give the right of taking books from the Congressional Library to the Attorney General, the Judges of the Supreme Court, while that court is in session, and to foreign Ministers.

On the fifth resolution, that of appropriating one thousand dollars annually for the increase of the library, some debate took place.

Mr. BAYARD advocated the appropriation, should it extend to ten or twenty years.

Mr. VARNUM thought the mode of appropriating money by resolution simply, improper; he thought a law ought to be passed.

Mr. BAYARD removed those objections by saying, that that would be done when the resolutions came before the House.

Mr. MACON thought the time of the appropriation ought to be limited.

Mr. LOWNDES moved to strike out the word "annually." Agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD, in considering the resolutions of the Committee of the Whole, was for striking out the words "Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House," supposing a Librarian ought to be appointed by the President.

When the subject was under discussion before the House, Mr. B. advocated the annual appropriation of one thousand dollars for ten years. He thought such measure advisable in preference to expending that sum at once, as there are continually new books, maps, &c., published, and there was the greater probability of being able to procure the most valuable publications.

Mr. RANDOLPH talked much of old practices; practices of expending unnecessarily, &c.; he said that expectation was on tiptoe to see the new practices, the practices of saving. For his part he was unwilling to expend the public money, except in cases of absolute necessity.

Mr. BACON, on mere principles of economy, would leave it indefinite, and a succeeding Congress might diminish or add to the sum to be annually expended for the library, as they pleased. He had not made a calculation, but he believed the House expended as much in deliberating as the sum about which they were contending would amount to.

Mr. GODDARD, of Connecticut, spoke in favor of one thousand dollars annually.

Mr. ELMER spoke against it.

Mr. BAYARD said, in reply to Mr. RANDOLPH, as the gentleman had talked so much of the disposition of the House heretofore to expend unnecessarily public money, he wished he would specify to what measures he alluded. It had been common to make such charges generally; he believed few dared specify. For his part he believed he was anxious as any one to hold fast and tight the purse-strings of the public. He would be as willing to curtail Executive power as any one: but if the gentleman's principles are carried to their extent, they should indeed spend but little. It had been said, we were the most enlightened people on earth; if that be not altogether true, let us make it as much so as possible.

Mr. BACON was in favor of ten thousand dollars annually. He thought it a moderate sum and a necessary appropriation.

It was carried in favor of one thousand dollars, but only for one year.

Mr. BAYARD moved that, instead of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House, a Librarian be appointed by the President; which proposition, after some debate, was not carried.

THURSDAY, December 24.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter and report from the Postmaster General, accompanying a list of post roads which have not produced one-third of the expense of carrying the mail on the same, after having been established for two years, transmitted in pursuance of the "Act to establish the Post Office of the United States;" which were read, and ordered to be referred to the committee appointed, on the tenth instant, to inquire whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to be made in the acts establishing a post office and post roads within the United States.

On motion, it was Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to lay before this House a table showing the comparative duties paid, in the ports of Great Britain, on goods imported into Great Britain in American, foreign, and British bottoms, since the fifth of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, so far as the same respects the commerce of the United States.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying a statement of the present Military Establishment of the United States, marked [A], and an estimate of all the posts and stations for which garrisons will be expedient, and of the number of men requisite, in his opinion, for each garrison, marked [B]; transmitted in pursuance of a resolution of this House of the twenty-second instant; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

On motion, it was Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to lay before this House the laws of the Northwestern and Indiana Territories, imposing taxes on the lands of non-residents.

On a motion made and seconded, it was Ordered, That the order of the day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the second enumeration, be postponed until Monday, the fourth day of January next.

The House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, December 28.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, accompanying his report on the memorial of Philip Sloan, referred to him by order of the House, on the fourteenth instant; which were read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

TUESDAY, December 29.

A petition of sundry citizens of the United States, resident in the Territory of Columbia, was presented to the House and read, praying that a bridge may be erected from the western and southern extremity of the Maryland avenue, in the City of Washington, to the nearest and most convenient point of Alexander's Island, in the river Potomac.—Referred to the committee appointed on the eighth instant, to inquire whether any, and if any, what alterations or amendments may be necessary in the existing government and laws of the District of Columbia.

Mr. VARNUM, from the committee appointed, on the seventh instant, to prepare and report such standing rules and orders as are proper to be observed in this House, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. DAVENPORT, from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, to whom it was referred, to examine and report such laws of the United States as have expired, or are near expiring, made a report, in part; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee on the resolutions of the Senate, on the subject of a Congressional library, begged leave to report by bill, which, being granted, he reported a resolution, "that the House disagree to the said resolutions." The House concurred.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is expedient to reduce the Military Establishment of the United States."

It was not the wish of Mr. RANDOLPH to precipitate a decision on this important subject. He, therefore, was willing that his resolution should lie for consideration at some future day.

Ordered, That it do lie on the table.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. RANDOLPH reported a "bill concerning the library for the use of both Houses of Congress;" which, after being twice read, was committed to a Committee of the whole House: Mr. RUTLEDGE in the Chair.

The bill provided that the members of both Houses, the President and Vice President of the United States, and the Judges of the Supreme Court, should have liberty to take any book from the library to read.

Mr. SPRIGG moved, to add the Judges of the District of Columbia. He was supported in argument by Mr. DENNIS, upon the ground of the importance of the causes which this especial district would present, and the great expense and extreme scarcity of some most valuable and necessary law books.

Mr. BAYARD objected to the motion, because he could discover no reason for distinguishing the judges of the district from others; but Judges of the Supreme Court being far from their libraries, required such references. He hoped the Congressional Library would never be subjected to the abuse which books used in courts of justice were too liable to.

The motion was not agreed to.

Some observations were made as to the time which the library was to remain open.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to confine it to the time of the session of Congress.

It was carried, with an exception moved by Mr. SOUTHARD, in favor of the Judges of the Supreme Court, whose sessions do not accord with those of Congress.

A blank was left as to the sum to be appropriated, in addition to the remaining part of the five thousand dollars heretofore appropriated, for the purchase of books.

On the Chairman's asking the sum with which to fill the blank, Mr. RANDOLPH moved to strike out the sections, observing that, of that sum, not more than $2,200 had been used, and $2,800 remained unexpended. He entertained no doubt but Congress would aid the institution by every timely grant.

It was stricken out. The bill was postponed till to-morrow.

The several sections of the bill prescribe—

1. That the library, consisting of all the books of the two Houses, be kept in the room, last session, occupied by the House of Representatives.

2 and 3. That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives appoint a librarian; and that the President and Speaker have the superintendence of the library, subject to the provisions of the act. The librarian to be allowed two dollars a day.

4. No map to be taken out of the library; and the books to be taken out by the President and Vice President of the United States, and the members of the two Houses, by the Heads of Departments and Attorney General, during the sitting of the Legislature, and by the Judges of the Supreme Court, during its sittings.

The unexpended balance of sums heretofore appropriated, viz., $2,800, to be applied to the purchase of books, under the direction of a joint committee of three members of each House.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House, on the said report and bill; and, after some time spent therein, the SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. RUTLEDGE reported that the committee had had the said report and bill under consideration, and directed him to report to the House their agreement to the resolution contained in the report, and several amendments to the bill.

WEDNESDAY, December 30.

A petition of Elias B. Caldwell, clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States, was presented to the House and read, stating the insufficiency of the fees and other emoluments allowed him by law, and praying that the same may be increased, and rendered more adequate to his services; also, that provision may be made, by law, for the safe-keeping of the books and records of the said Court.—Referred to Mr. DENNIS, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. BISHOP; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. DAVIS, from the committee appointed on the 14th instant, to inquire into the expediency of giving further time to persons entitled to military land warrants, to obtain and locate the same; and, also, to report what provision ought to be made by law to authorize the Secretary of War to issue military land warrants, and duplicates of the same, where satisfactory proof is made that the originals have been lost, destroyed, or obtained by fraud, made a report, in part; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House took up the Library bill, when Mr. RANDOLPH moved to strike out that part which gave permission to the Heads of Departments,

7th CON.—12

Judges of the Supreme Court, and foreign Ministers, to take out books; which was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-day.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; when Mr. Randolph submitted his motion of yesterday, viz: "that it is expedient to reduce the Military Establishment of the United States." He made the motion in Committee of the Whole as it appeared to be more consonant to the proceedings of the House.

The resolution was agreed to without a division, and reported to the House, who concurred, and appointed a committee of five to bring in a bill.

THURSDAY, December 31.

An engrossed bill concerning the library for the use of both Houses of Congress was read the third time, and passed.

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, and that the title be, "An act concerning the library for the use of both Houses of Congress."

A message was received from the Senate, offering, for the concurrence of the House, resolutions, approving the gallant conduct of Captain Sterret and his crew in the capture of a Tripolitan corsair of superior force; requesting the President to present Captain Sterret with a gold medal with suitable emblems; and to present the other commissioned officers with swords; with a concluding resolution, that the non-commissioned officers and crew receive an extra month's pay.

Ordered, To lie for consideration till Monday.

INTERNAL TAXES.

Mr. DAVIS moved the appointment of a committee to inquire into the expediency of repealing the acts imposing duties on stills and distilled spirits, on refined sugars, on sales at auction, and on pleasure carriages.

Mr. DAVIS said his object, in making this motion, was, that the House should accomplish that directly, which had been this session attempted in so circuitous a way as to embarrass and delay its proceedings. He saw no reason for going into a Committee of the Whole, in order to arrive at decisions that might better be made directly by the House itself.

On this motion a debate of considerable length ensued, in which, on the one side, the reference to a select committee, and, on the other, a reference to a Committee of the whole House was advocated. No decision was had, and of course the motion of Mr. D. was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MITCHILL observed, that it was contemplated, in the President's Message, that it would be necessary to appropriate an annual sum for Naval purposes. It appeared, also, from the Message, that some doubt was entertained by the Executive of the competency of his power to employ superintendents, and to fix navy yards. He mentioned these circumstances with the view of offering a resolution that a committee may be formed on the subject, who should inquire into the expediency of applying to naval purposes the proceeds of the sales of public vessels.

On the suggestion of the SPEAKER, Mr. MITCHILL moved the going into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in which he would make his proposed motion.

On this motion, a debate of considerable length ensued, in which Mr. DAVIS declared that he thought this the fit time to determine the propriety of that circuitous mode of procedure, which had been practised this session.

Mr. DAVIS, for reasons which he assigned at length, in which Mr. EUSTIS fully concurred, supported the propriety of a reference in the first instance to a select committee.

MESSRS. GRISWOLD, RUTLEDGE, BAYARD, RANDOLPH, and DANA, supported a reference to a Committee of the Whole.

The House decided in favor of going into a Committee of the Whole; when

Mr. MITCHILL moved, that so much of the President's Message as relates to naval preparations and to the establishment of sites for naval purposes, be referred to a select committee, which was agreed to in Committee, confirmed in the House, and a committee of five appointed.

Mr. BAYARD, during the course of the debate—in allusion to the adoption yesterday of the resolution of Mr. RANDOLPH for reducing the Military Establishment, which he thought premature, not considering the House as sufficiently acquainted with the details of the subject to act upon it—said, that if gentlemen were for reducing the Army in whatever degree, or for abandoning it altogether, he should go with them. He would, on such occasion, be governed by the same principles which had hitherto guided him. He had heretofore been disposed to repose a liberal confidence in the Executive of the United States; and when an increase of our military force had been recommended by the President, he had invariably been for it; much more would he be disposed, when a reduction was recommended from the same quarter to sanction it by his vote. With the Executive rested the responsibility of the exterior defence of the nation; and if the Executive was of opinion that the nation was secure with a force of three, two, or one thousand, or without even a single man, he would concur with him in giving effect to such a conviction.

Mr. RANDOLPH was called up by these remarks. He had little thought that his motion, agreed to yesterday sub silentio, and without the least hesitation, would have been made the topic of such animated animadversion as he had heard to-day. He would tell the gentleman from Delaware, that his motion had neither been immature in substance, nor premature as to time. It would be recollected, that previous to its adoption, the Secretary of War had been called upon to furnish information to the House. He had furnished information, to his mind completely satisfactory. He had stated the establishment to be five thousand men; and his opinion that all the garrisons required only three thousand men. Could it, then, with any reason be called premature to act upon such information? If the gentleman from Delaware, or other gentlemen thought so, why not combat a decision at the time? Did they imagine that, without the expression of a murmur by them, the mover would himself rise and oppose his own motion?

As to the delay which had been noticed, as having taken place in the transaction of business, it was not to be ascribed to any particular mode of procedure; but to the unusual languor of the season; to the absence of several members of great weight; to the augmentation of new members not yet fully acquainted with the forms of business, and to the unusual mass of information presented to the House, which enlarged the field of action, and to the delays of printing arising from the unusual quantity of matter submitted.

INTERNAL TAXES.

Mr. BAYARD moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of enabling him to offer a resolution to the following effect:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the laws laying duties on stills and distilled spirits, on refined sugar, on sales at auction, on pleasurable carriages, on stamps, and on postage of letters."

Mr. BAYARD made this motion for the purpose of placing the important subject contemplated by it in a train for decision. He thought it full time to commence our proceedings on it; and in his opinion, it was fit that the consideration of the subject, generally, should go before the Committee of Ways and Means. The subject was so important as to strike at the vital principles of our revenue. The repeal of the internal taxes involved a reduction of six hundred thousand dollars in our receipts. The propriety of such a reduction did not constitute a distinct subject for consideration, but depended upon the deductions made on a comprehensive view of our finances, which could only be taken by the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was committed generally whatever regarded revenue.

If the minds of gentlemen, said Mr. B., were made up to abolish all the internal taxes, it must be to them perfectly immaterial to what committee a reference was made. He knew the flattering prospects held out by the President, and he hoped they would all be verified. But his own mind was not made up, nor did he know that the minds of other gentlemen were made up on the propriety of dispensing with these taxes. He was led to this inference by observing no official notice to such effect in the communications made by the Secretary of the Treasury. On the contrary, the Secretary had so made his calculations, predicated as they were upon the continuance of these taxes, that his calculations would be greatly deranged by dispensing with them. Mr. B. knew not that we were prepared to leap this precipice. If the public burdens could be reduced, he would be delighted with the act of reduction. Yet still, if the sum of six hundred thousand dollars, derived from these taxes, could be dispensed with, doubts might be entertained whether the internal taxes were those which should be first either reduced or abolished. He held it to be a correct principle, that taxation should be equal, and that no one class of citizens should be burdened to the exemption of all other classes. From a slight consideration of the subject, he had found no other way of enabling our brethren to the westward to participate in the public burdens than by affording them an opportunity of paying their portion of internal revenue. It might appear, on investigation, that more substantial relief would be afforded to the various descriptions of our citizens, by continuing the internal taxes; and reducing those on imports; and if it should be thought proper to diminish the burden imposed on our Western citizens, he would ask whether that effect would not be more substantially accomplished by reducing the tax upon salt? It would be recollected that great opposition had been made to the imposition of this tax, which had been denominated oppressive, as it fell upon an article of necessity.

Internal Taxes.

Attention ought, also, to be paid to the liability of several articles to be smuggled, the only mode of preventing which was well known to be a reduction of the duties.

Mr. B. stated these circumstances, not as evidences of having matured his own ideas; but to show the necessity of referring the subject to a committee, whose special duty it was to take a general view of the resources and expenses of the nation, and who, therefore, in the present stage of the session, were alone in a situation to make the requisite inquiry.

Mr. EUSTIS said that the reasons offered by the gentleman from Delaware were with him conclusive that this was not the proper time for considering the subject. Until we know the reductions in the expenditures of the Government that are to be made, it is impossible that we can say how far it will be expedient to reduce or abolish our taxes. We had not determined to what extent the Army or the Navy should be reduced, nor had we come to any ultimate decision on any reduction whatever. For these reasons he must oppose a decision at this time upon the subject, whether that decision was in this or any other shape.

Mr. BACON concurred with Mr. EUSTIS in considering any decision as at present premature.

Mr. RUTLEDGE viewed the subject as of great importance. He could not figure to his imagination one likely to occur this session of equal importance. The President contemplated a repeal of all the internal revenues, and the imposition of all taxes upon imported articles. The Secretary of the Treasury appears, by implication, to be of a different opinion, and contemplates a continuance of these duties. What is the object of the gentleman from Delaware? Why delay; time for consideration, by reference of the subject to a committee most competent to inquire? As to the public burdens, every member on the floor had a common feeling. We do not wish to lay unnecessary taxes. But when taxes are laid, when they are uncomplained of, it was indeed deeply interesting without consideration to decide on their abolition. Mr. R. said, for himself, he should be embarrassed by being forced into an immediate decision. We want information before we are called upon to decide. The motion seeks that information. It sends the business to the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom it belongs of right. It is their duty to consider it, for whatever relates to revenue must go to them. Gentlemen cannot say that they are surprised. By the resolution, they are not called upon to decide upon the subject; they are only called upon to place it in a train for decision.

Mr. MACON hoped the business would be taken up, and the sooner it was done the better. It was certainly of great importance, and the earlier the House proceeded to consider it, the sooner would they be prepared for deciding upon it. If the vote of reference was final, the arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts would apply. But this was not the case.

It had been said that the President had declared his opinion that we can dispense with these taxes. The statement was not correct. His opinion was contingent. He had said, we may dispense with these taxes in case we proportionably reduce the expenses.

As to the remarks made respecting the different opinions of the President and Secretary of the Treasury, they likewise were erroneous. Distinct views were taken by each. The President, contemplating a reduction in the expenses, intimates the expediency of repealing the internal taxes; whereas the Secretary of the Treasury, taking things as they are, states the effects of their continuance. From these circumstances, no diversity of opinion could be inferred.

Mr. M. concluded by expressing a hope that the expenses of the Government would be reduced, that the internal taxes would be taken off, and that immediate measures would be pursued for preparing the House for a final decision.

Mr. EUSTIS was alike hostile to the present motion and to that which had been made by the gentleman from Kentucky, who had yesterday introduced the subject. He had heard the motion with a sensation of uncommon surprise; for he was of opinion that the public attention should not be attracted; or the public sensation excited, till we should be able to determine the course proper to be pursued. He felt himself unprepared to decide, and believed other gentlemen were equally unprepared. He hoped that he cherished a suitable respect for the President of the United States, though he did not know that he would go so far as the gentleman from Delaware, and disband a whole army at his word.

The wisest course was to wait until information was obtained. This would in fact be gaining time. If the Committee of Ways and Means were to consider the subject, it must be under the present state of things. They could not take for granted what might or might not be done by Congress; and before Congress could decide, they must have information which they do not yet possess. He who, under present circumstances, attempted to say to what length our retrenchments would go, and what taxes we could spare, might indeed be called a prophet.

We ought not, said Mr. E., to stir the public sensibility improperly or prematurely. By exciting that sensibility before we had determined how to act in future, impressions may be raised which we shall not be able to satisfy.

Mr. SMILIE concurred in opinion with Mr. E., and moved, as the best mode of disposing of the subject, that the Committee rise.

Mr. GRISWOLD declared himself against delay. He knew not why the House were not prepared to decide immediately. The President had introduced the subject, and if any sensibility had been excited, it must be ascribed to him, and not to us. Nor did he think that any ill effects would flow from attracting the public attention. The President did not know, when he addressed us, that we would be for a reduction of the expenses; yet, thinking as he did, it was highly proper in him to give his opinion to the House. So proposed to us, it would exhibit a want of respect to that Magistrate not to take it up immediately. Not to act upon it promptly would be subversive of the national tranquillity after the attention of the public had been directed to it.

Mr. SMILIE had thought the gentleman from Connecticut was too well acquainted with the proceedings of that House to say that the Committee of Ways and Means were prepared to act upon this subject. Did they know how far we would reduce the Army, the Navy, or the Judiciary?

Mr. VARNUM hoped the Committee would rise. Any disposition of the subject was at present premature. As to the calculations of the Secretary, alluded to, they were made from the existing revenue, and all his deductions were made therefrom. The President had taken another view of the subject. Contemplating the probability of a reduction in our expenses, he had stated that, in such event, we could dispense with the internal taxes. But whether the contemplated reduction could be made, the House were not prepared to say. Of one thing he was sure, that not a single necessary tax would be abandoned.

Mr. DANA said, that more than three weeks have elapsed since the President's communication has been laid before us, and, during that time, a sense of decorum has not induced us to take up one of the most important parts of it. He certainly agreed with gentlemen that we ought to take up the subject and decide for ourselves. If we concur with the President, we shall repeal the laws; if we do not concur, we may, it is true, risk our popularity by opposing so favorite a measure with the people. But, placed as we shall be between popularity on the one hand, and duty on the other, as honest men we should do our duty. But certainly it is our duty now to examine the subject. Grant that the reduction in our expenses may extend to a million, though scarcely half that sum could be hoped for; still the question remains what taxes shall be diminished. He could not, for his part, feel all that horror of public sensibility that had been portrayed by the gentleman from Massachusetts. What have we to fear, suppose we interfere with that sensibility? If we do so in the discharge of our duty, he was perfectly willing it should be excited; nay, it would be useful to the people themselves.

Mr. EUSTIS was perfectly ready to meet the public sensibility, whether for or against us. We had already tried it both ways. He was much pleased with the respect professed by gentlemen for the public sensibility, and also for the communications of the President. But there were parts of those communications, which, notwithstanding the impatience of gentlemen, they would not be displeased at laying unacted upon, not merely three weeks, but three months.

Mr. BAYARD did not expect an opposition to his motion from the quarter from which it came; for he had a right to expect as much deference to the President from the opposite, as from his own side. For his part he felt no terrors at meeting the whole, or any part of the President's communications. Whatever he recommended that was right, he would vote for, and whatever was wrong, he would oppose. Though his former habits had led him to cherish a respect for the President, of which he did not repent, yet he felt no servility that would lead him to repress an expression of his sentiments.

A gentleman from Pennsylvania had talked about reducing the Army, the Navy, and the Judiciary. But there were other expenses which the gentleman might have dwelt on. Why silent on the Legislature? Let us reduce the length of our sessions. It did not appear consistent in that gentleman to strike at the Judiciary, and other departments, and leave untouched whatever affected himself.

Mr. RANDOLPH did not desire to occupy much of the time of the Committee, as he thought it immaterial whether the Committee rise or not. But he wished, for the information, and perhaps for the satisfaction, of the gentleman from Massachusetts, to state that, among other members, he was one who had not decided whether Government could dispense with the internal taxes. He hoped, and was inclined to believe, that they might be dispensed with. The Secretary of the Treasury had expressly stated that part of his report was speculative, viz: that part which inferred the effects of peace. The correctness of the opinion of the Secretary on this point must decide the House as to the propriety of giving up these taxes. He was one who, though he did not think a state of peace would materially affect the revenue, had not decided whether a reduction of the public impositions in this or that species of revenue should be made. He noticed these things, to prevent an impression being made on the public mind that the House were for precipitating a decision. As to the public sensation, he felt no alarm. He knew that our measures must depend upon the reductions we shall make.

Mr. R., for these reasons, was against any decision now; and had the gentleman from Kentucky pressed his motion yesterday, he was prepared to move a postponement of it. In the mean time, there were other important topics involved in the Message that might be referred and acted upon.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

Mr. DANA presumed that the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts had done him the honor of alluding to him in his remarks. He was not very solicitous that the subject should be inquired into, but since it was brought up, he must say that nothing short of the talents of the honorable gentleman could furnish a semblance of reason for not going immediately into the inquiry. That gentleman errs egregiously if he imagines that I can dread an investigation of any point involved in the President's Message. He would add, that whatever his particular opinion might be of the person to whom had been confided the Government of the nation, it became him only to see in him the First Magistrate of the country, and to treat him with correspondent respect, and to see in what he did, not the man, but the measure.

The question was then taken on the Committee rising, and lost—yeas 29, nays 48.

The reference to the Committee of Ways and Means was then carried, both in Committee and in the House, without a division.

The House adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, January 4, 1802.

WILLIAM BARRY GROVE, from North Carolina, appeared, produced his credentials, and took his seat in the House.

Ordered, That Mr. MILLEDGE be appointed to the Committee of Ways and Means, in the room of Mr. DICKSON, who is sick and unable to attend.

Petitions of sundry aliens residing in the county of Lancaster, in the State of Pennsylvania, were presented to the House and read, respectively praying a modification or repeal of the act of Congress, passed the eighteenth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, entitled "An act supplementary to, and to amend, the act, entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the act heretofore passed on that subject."—Referred to the committee appointed, on the fifteenth ultimo, to prepare and bring in a bill or bills for a revision and amendment of the laws respecting naturalization.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, enclosing a report from the Commissioners appointed under the act, entitled "An act for the better government of the Navy of the United States," passed the twenty-third of April, one thousand eight hundred, relative to the proceedings of the Board since their last report, dated the twenty-ninth of November, one thousand eight hundred; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Samuel Dexter, late Secretary of War, praying to be indemnified in the case of a suit now pending against him in the capacity aforesaid, in the court of the United States for the District of Columbia, on account of a contract entered into with a certain Joseph Hodgson, in behalf of the United States, for the rent of a house in the City of Washington, as a War Office, in the year one thousand eight hundred, and which, whilst occupied as aforesaid, was consumed by fire.

Ordered, That the said letter be referred to Mr. GRISWOLD, Mr. HANNA, Mr. DENNIS, Mr. EUSTIS, and Mr. NICHOLSON, to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report on the memorial of John Hobby, late Marshal of the District of Maine, referred to him by order of the House, on the fourteenth ultimo; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an account of the receipts and expenditures of the United States for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine; also, tables exhibiting the accounts of the collectors and supervisors of the revenue for the same year; which were read and ordered to lie on the table.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the House should go into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with the view of submitting three resolutions to the Committee, viz:

"Resolved, That it is expedient to inquire whether any, and what, alterations should be made in the Judicial Establishment of the United States.

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made for the impartial selection of juries.

"Resolved, That it is expedient to inquire whether any, and what, reductions can be made in the civil expenses of the Government of the United States."

The House accordingly went into Committee.

Mr. BAYARD presumed an agreement to these resolutions would, in their present shape, meet with no opposition. It was impossible to determine what shape they would ultimately assume. The Judiciary system was doubtless susceptible of amendment, and if any proper amendments should be proposed, he would concur in their adoption. With respect to the second resolution, though he did not know that there was any necessity for altering the mode at present practised of selecting juries, not having heard of any complaints under it, yet, as the resolution only led to an inquiry into the subject, he would not object.

With regard to the last resolution, it was one in which we must all concur. The object, if attainable, would be extremely grateful to all of us.

The three resolutions were agreed to without a division. The Committee then rose, and reported them to the House.

On the report being taken up, Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the consideration of the two first resolutions be postponed till the third Monday of January.

Mr. BAYARD hoped the motion for postponement would not prevail. The propositions were abstract ones, leading to inquiry, and the sooner they were acted upon the better. The mode pursued by the gentlemen from Virginia, if his simple object was to give notice, was the least happy that he could have devised, for it gave to gentlemen no opportunity to prepare themselves, as they were totally unacquainted, in the present stage of the business, as to what would be the alterations proposed. If a committee were now appointed, they would have time to deliberate on a subject of the utmost importance—one so complicated as to require great attention. When their report was made, he would be one of those who would ask from the candor of the House time to consider it.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, he was at all times willing to accommodate gentlemen of every political description on proper occasions. Apprehending that his resolutions, if taken up in the House, would give rise to discussion, he had moved for their postponement, from a wish not to interfere with the desire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and other gentlemen, to act on the apportionment bill. As his motion for postponement appeared likely to be itself productive of discussion, by which the time of the House would be exhausted, and the means he used defeat the end he had in view, he would withdraw his motion.

The House then agreed to the resolutions without a division.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved the reference of the two first resolutions to the same committee.

He said, in reply to the gentleman from Delaware, that he made the motion respecting juries not because any complaint did at present exist of the exercise of the powers under which jurors were selected, but because they had not long since existed, and because in similar circumstances they might again exist. He was glad the gentleman from Delaware had no reason to complain of their present abuse. But this was no security against the future.

Mr. BAYARD said that he had spoken as he had done, not for the purpose of expressing any opinion that any abuse respecting juries had been recently removed under the present state of things; but to state that he had never heard of any complaints on this subject in the part of the Union from which he came; and he had particularly alluded to the mode of designating jurors in his State, which was by ballot. But if there were complaints in other parts of the Union, he would co-operate in any means that could be devised for removing them.

Mr. SMILE said, that since the gentleman from Delaware had introduced the subject, and had declared that no complaints existed, he would say that complaints had existed, that just grounds for them existed, and that they had been expressed in the loudest tone. And he would appeal to the gentleman from Delaware whether any man could be safe who was at the mercy of a marshal, who was the mere creature of the President.

Mr. BAYARD.—While man continues as he is, there will be complaints on this subject. We are divided into parties. The people as well as the President must belong to one side or the other; and whether we have sheriffs chosen by the people or marshals appointed by the President the evil will still exist. He had no objection, if it were the wish of gentlemen, that the marshals should be appointed by the people; though we know that the people are as apt, nay, more apt, to be infected with violent political feelings than an Executive officer.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that without desiring to exhaust the time of the House on a point where there was no difference of opinion, he could not permit the observation of the gentleman from Delaware to pass unnoticed; that an officer, holding a lucrative office, appointed by the President, and dependent upon his will, is as independent as a sheriff, elected in some States annually by the people, and in other States appointed in a manner calculated to insure his independence. He would instance the State of Virginia, in which the sheriffs were nominated by the justices of the county courts, who, it was understood, were to hold the office of sheriff in rotation. Will the gentleman say that these men, who are independent of the pleasure of any man, are liable to be made the same tools, with officers who hold their appointments at the absolute will of one man?

Mr. R. would further say, that the remark of the gentleman from Delaware, that the existence of no complaints had ever come to his ears, had excited his extreme astonishment. In North Carolina, he believed, no legal jury had been selected since the establishment of the Federal Government. In that State, in the State courts, all juries are first selected in the inferior courts, and then sent to the superior courts. He would ask, how, under these circumstances, a jury could be struck in a federal court in that State agreeably to law? In Virginia and Pennsylvania the independence of sheriffs is secured, therefore, no restrictions are imposed upon them in selecting juries; whereas, in the federal courts the Marshal is the abject creature of the Executive—and yet we are told the security is the same! Mr. R. did not wish to consume the time of the House; but when views are taken by gentlemen calculated, either as to fact or sentiment, to lead the public mind astray, if other gentlemen did not, he would invariably notice them.

Mr. BAYARD desired to explain. He had not meant to contend that sheriffs chosen for three years by the people were as dependent as similar officers appointed by the President. He had alluded to the effects which flowed from a marked division of parties. We were in all events subject to that evil. It was a truth that men deeply infected with party were more apt to be chosen by the people than by an Executive magistrate; because the people felt more strongly a degree of political fanaticism.

After some further debate, it was determined to refer the two first resolutions to a committee of seven, and the last to a committee of five members.

Ordered, That Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. JOHN TALIAFERRO, Jr., Mr. GODDARD, Mr. RUTLEDGE, Mr. ISRAEL SMITH, Mr. HENDERSON, and Mr. BAILEY, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the first and second resolutions.

Ordered, That Mr. BACON, Mr. GROVE, Mr. ELMENDORF, Mr. HEMPHILL, and Mr. ABRAM TRIGG, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the third resolution.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the second enumeration.

Mr. BAYARD moved to strike out the ratio of 33,000, for the purpose of substituting 30,000.

He was in favor of this last ratio, because it was the one within our Constitutional limits which left the fewest unrepresented fractions, and because he thought it very important that that ratio should be adopted, which would entitle the smaller States to at least two Representatives; that in case one of the Representatives were sick, or unavoidably absent, the State might not go unrepresented. Besides it was of great moment to a State, particularly to the State which he represented, that its Representative should have a coadjutor with whom to consult on its interests.

The ratio of 33,000 would be peculiarly severe in its operation on Delaware, as it would leave an unrepresented fraction of 29,000.

The ratio of 30,000 was still more to be preferred on general than on local principles. He had always been for increasing the strength of the Government of the United States; no further, it was true, than to enable it to protect itself from subversion or depression by the unconstitutional encroachments of the States. He might in some measure have derived these views from the relation in which he stood to a small State; for it was certain that the smaller States had a deeper interest in the Federal Government than the larger States; as, without the protection of that Government, they might be overwhelmed by the larger States.

He never had believed that the strength of the Government was to be increased by extending the power of the Executive. But he believed its strength would be increased by augmenting the numbers of that House, which would invigorate the affections of the people; and he believed that by thus increasing the energies of this body, more power would be conferred on the Government by an addition of ten members, than would be conferred by giving it an army of 10,000 men.

The gentleman from Virginia had denied that this House was the representative of the people, affirming it to be the representative of the States. Mr. B. hoped, if he misinterpreted his ideas, that the gentleman would explain.

Mr. RANDOLPH would explain. He had said that this House was not the representative of the people over the United States, but the representative of the people of the individual States in their sovereign State capacities.

Mr. BAYARD considered the opinion of the gentleman incorrect, and thought it extremely important that on this point correct ideas should be entertained. He viewed the representation in that House as national, and he considered himself as much the Representative of Virginia as the gentleman himself. In this House we have no other relation to the States than that which regards our origin. We form a great national body, designed for national purposes; and as soon as we come here we lose our State characters. The Government is of a mixed kind. In the Senate the States are completely and exclusively represented. But on this floor there subsists no relation to States. We are solely related to the people, and our representation is in proportion to the numbers of the people.

There was one argument to him conclusive. A majority of Representatives may bind a majority of States; and the Representatives of three or four States, forming that majority, may bind the whole Union.

Mr. B. knew that the arguments he had urged had been met by the expression of a fear that this body might gain an influence that would outweigh the several States; and that this Government might become too strong for the governments of the States. But his fear was that the governments of the States might become too strong for this Government. What reason was there to apprehend danger from the augmentation of the members of this House from about one hundred and forty, of which it would consist according to the ratio of 33,000, to one hundred and fifty-four, of which it would consist according to that of 30,000? Can the States apprehend any danger? For instance can Virginia entertain alarm? When at present she sends here nineteen members, and has in her own legislature from one hundred and ninety to two hundred members; and when, according to the two ratios proposed, she will send either twenty-two or twenty-four members? Is it conceivable that the confidence of the citizens of Virginia can be shaken in her own State representation, by this inconsiderable addition to her federal representation?

Mr. B. concluded by recapitulating his arguments in favor of the ratio of 30,000.

Mr. RANDOLPH considered this question as involving two points: The one, which was of inferior magnitude, whether the representation upon this floor should be increased, by a few members, with a view to the relative weight of this or that State; the other, which was of the last importance, whether it should be so increased for the purpose avowed by the gentleman from Delaware, of augmenting the power, as yet too small, of this Government, and of course so far diminishing that of the States. Thus the question, in itself a matter of comparatively small moment, becomes of serious consequence as a test of political opinion. I wish to put it upon that issue, to see whether a majority of this House are disposed to advocate the position of that gentleman. Without entering into the question, whether the power devolved on the General Government by the Constitution, exceeded that measure, which, in its formation, he would have been willing to bestow, he had no hesitation in declaring that it did not fall short of it; that he dreaded its extension, by whatever means, and should always oppose measures whose object or tendency it was to effect it. The gentleman tells you, sir, that from the number of its connexions with the people, the State governments possess their confidence in a high degree; that there is danger of an abuse of this confidence; that through it the large States may thwart and control the General Government; that it then behooves the small States to come into the measure which he proposes, from a consideration that it will operate, in that way, to reduce the power of the large States. An increase of representation, we are told, will do more towards increasing the power of the General Government than a military force. But when military and naval preparations and every other expedient devised for carrying that power beyond the Constitutional limit has failed, I trust that this House is not to be sent on that forlorn hope, at the instance of those whose interest it is in the distribution of power between the several branches of this Government, to transfer as much of it as possible to the other branches; who have, in the pursuit of this system, contended that we did not possess a discretion over the public money, but were bound to appropriate it on requisition from the Executive.

This House, I trust, is not become an engine in such hands for engulfing into the vortex of the General Government the powers of the States, and then settling the distribution of those powers. They will recollect that the exercise of this power, to be wrested from the States, is to be shared by co-ordinate branches of the Government, where the weight which regulates this body is felt, either partially, or not at all; I mean the population of the States. If a consolidation into one great National Government is to take place; if ever the State governments are to be set aside; if the powers of this Government are to extend beyond objects federal in their nature, let us not suppose that the people of the United States would freely consent to the exercise of those powers by a Government which, if viewed as the Government of an individual sovereignty, and not as that of a number of confederated States, contains principles which are highly objectionable; which are even repugnant to our received truths respecting the nature of Government. For, sir, I hold that if there be a principle fixed in politics, it is that the people of every country should have their equal weight in the direction of their Government. But suppose the State governments gone, or existing as the mere skeletons of power, while this Government, in high political health and vigor, is in the exercise of every right belonging to an individual sovereignty. Look to the distribution of those powers; see by whom they are to be exercised. In this branch alone you will find the Republican character; in the other it is not to be seen. There, is that principle virtually acknowledged which gives to Old Sarum and Newton a representation equal to that of London; a principle which is believed by some essential to the existence of that well-ordered Government, or perhaps of any other which they are willing to bestow upon man; the principle that the governors are not to be under the complete control of the governed; in other words, that the majority ought not to govern. In the appointment of the Executive the same spirit prevails, although somewhat modified. When a Government thus constructed is to exercise the power, our surprise is somewhat diminished that those who would possess so undue a share of that power, were it once consolidated, should feel disposed to augment the influence of the Government; nor that those who would be dispossessed, in that event, of their full share in the direction of affairs, should be equally anxious to restrict it. But the Committee will perceive the wide distinction between this Government and that of an individual State. The one is simple, and all parts of it are referable to a great principle; the other is the creature of compromise, instituted for Federal purposes, to which the States were incompetent. The proposed devolution of power was so great, so intimately affecting the wealth and population of the States, as to excite in the large States an invincible repugnance to part with it, unless its exercise was in some measure regulated by the quantum of the population and wealth. Hence the origin of this House, elected by the States, in the ratio of population and wealth; while in the Senate the sovereignties, as such, are allowed an equal representation, and the influence in the appointment of the Executive is compounded of these. And even this power of choosing the Chief Magistrate of the Union, is, in a certain event, which has already occurred, and which will be memorable as long as this Government endures, to be exercised by this House, voting not so that the delegations shall represent the population and wealth of the States, but their sovereignty only. Did not the gentleman from Delaware feel his weight on this floor to be equal to that of nineteen Delegates from Virginia? This spirit of compromise, sir, I conceive to be the key of the Government. It is the principle which pervades it throughout and resolves every question which arises on its nature. This shows, sir, that it is to exercise Federal powers, leaving to the States the regulation of internal concerns. For this object, it is constructed so as to compose the jarring interests of the States. Extend it further, let it embrace objects for which it was not designed, let it trench upon the powers of the States; make it a National Government, in the sense contended for, and it becomes a Government vicious in its organization, since the reasons for that organization cease to apply whenever it ceases to be a Government of States, and becomes a Government of the people in the aggregate. And yet it is affirmed that we are not the Representatives of the States—that is, of the people of those States in their respective sovereign capacities—but of the aggregate of the people of the United States, in their national capacity. If that be the case, should we not apply the ratio to the aggregate of persons entitled to representation in the United States, and not to those portions in the respective States? If this be true, where is the Federal character of this Government? And yet the gentleman affirms that he is the Representative as much of Virginia as Delaware, and the Representatives of the first are equally the Rep-representatives of the last. Wherefore? Because his acts are to bind Virginia as well as Delaware. If this proved anything it would prove that the Senators of each State represented all the States, for certainly their acts are binding upon them. But if the gentleman does represent Virginia, certain I am that I do not represent Delaware; I am not elected by the people of that State; I receive no credentials from it to this House; I hold not myself responsible to it. I know it not on this floor, except through the medium of its legitimate organ, through which it speaks to us, its Representative. Upon this view, sir, what becomes of the complaint that the gentleman is deserting of a colleague with whom he may consult; possessing as he does the whole Committee for his colleagues?

Apportionment Bill.

H. OF R.

As another motive to accede to his proposition we are told that it will increase the relative weight of one or more small States. I hope I shall be pardoned for observing that this motive has been selected with singular infelicity, since it is addressed to the large States, who may, without improper imputation, be supposed of opinion that the weight of the small States is already sufficiently felt, and that it does not behoove them to give their aid to increase that weight in this branch of the Legislature, to the comparative diminution of their own, to the utmost limits which the Constitution will permit.

Mr. R. concluded by observing, that he thought the House would be sufficiently numerous, at the ratio contemplated by the bill, for all Federal purposes; that to increase the representation to meet the views of the gentleman from Delaware, would, in their fullest extent, were it practicable, supplant the State governments. That the difference of five or ten members more or less on that floor was in itself unimportant. That if the ratio had been fixed originally at thirty thousand he should have felt little disposed to increase it, but he would not carry it back merely to answer the purpose for which it was fixed at thirty-three, the accommodation of certain States—much less with a view to decrease the influence of the State governments.

Mr. GRISWOLD had at the first been for a higher ratio than that of 33,000; and he would still be in favor of it did there appear any chance of its success. But as the dispute seemed to be between the ratios of 33,000 and 30,000, and as the former was the worst possible ratio that could be adopted, as it left the greatest aggregate of fractions, and operated with the greatest severity upon the small States, he should be for that of 30,000 in preference.

He had been surprised at the remark which had fallen from the gentleman from Virginia, that the members on the floor of this House were not the Representatives of the people; and he was more particularly astonished at this remark coming from the large States. He deemed the principle on which it was founded a dangerous principle, one subversive of the Government, and in the face of the Constitution, one which called upon every friend of the Constitution, and of the national harmony, to repel it, as calculated to confer on the large States all power.

What does the Constitution say: "We the people of the United States," (not of Virginia, &c.,) "form a Government." It is afterwards declared to be established for the United States. It is the Constitution of the people of the United States. It constitutes a Senate and House of Representatives. Whose Senate and whose House of Representatives, he would ask? The Constitution would answer, not of the particular States, but of the United States. Is not this the plain reading of the Constitution? Can any gentleman say, he represents only Pennsylvania, or Virginia? No, sir, he comes not to consult the interest of Pennsylvania, or Virginia, but of the whole United States.

If the opposite principle be adopted, viz: that members are the Representatives of the States from which they come, then are the effects obvious. A combination of the Representatives of four States, composing a majority of this House, may overwhelm the whole interests of the United States. It had been said out of doors that such a prospect existed. He had not believed it. He did not wish still to believe it; and he hoped the Committee, seeing the danger of such an impression, would avoid whatever went to countenance it.

Mr. BACON.—The question before the Committee is an interesting one, and gentlemen who have risen to speak to it, appear to feel it to be such. There is reason to believe that whenever the question is determined, it will be done on uniform and moderate principles. It is to be hoped that few, if any, will be influenced to act by a fondness for extremes. Because I cannot be gratified by the adoption of one extreme, I will not rush to the opposite one.

A principal reason that is offered in favor of the amendment seems to be, the accommodation of Delaware; it is to relieve that State from a large fraction, and to give her two members in the House of Representatives.

I would pay the same respect to the State of Delaware that I would pay to any other State of the Union in like circumstances. The reason that is urged for striking out thirty-three, with a view to insert thirty, so far as it relates to the accommodation of Delaware, must, as I conceive, be predicated either on the principles of the Constitution, or on the principles of equity.

By the Constitution they are entitled to two members in the Senate. This, I believe, is about five times their equal proportion of representation in that branch of the Legislature, if the calculation was to be made either on their numbers or their property. But, in answer to this, it is said, and I readily admit that the answer is a just one: This is a right which they hold by mutual compact, that is, by the Constitution; and therefore ought not to be taken into consideration in determining the present question.

On the other hand, it must also be admitted that, by the same Constitution, they are entitled to that proportion of representation, and no more, in the other branch of the Legislature, which may fall to them on any given uniform ratio which Congress are authorized and see fit to adopt. This position is no less equitable, sound, and rational, than the other; consequently, no argument can, as I conceive, be drawn from the principles of the Constitution in favor of the proposed amendment, as it may affect the particular case of Delaware.

Again: If leaving the general principles of the Constitution we recur to mere principles of equity, I believe the result will be nearly the same in both cases.

On mere principles of equity, I suppose it will be admitted that each State in the Union is entitled to a representation in Congress proportioned either to the number of its inhabitants, or to what it contributes to the support of the Government, which are considered as amounting to nearly the same thing. Calculating on these principles, then, the State of Delaware, even on the present ratio of 33,000, will have nearly one third more than its equal proportion of representation in the Congress. I can see no reason, therefore, to alter the present ratio, and thereby to create an annual and permanent expense of twenty or thirty thousand dollars, only for the sake of lowering a fraction and thereby adding one more Representative to the State of Delaware; and especially when I consider that, as the ratio now stands, she has more than her full proportion of representation in the Legislature; and that, whether the calculation is made on mere principles of equity, or on the common or the most rigid principles of the Constitution.

It has also been mentioned, as a reason for lowering the present ratio of representation, that the extent of election districts will thereby be contracted, and that, in this way, an opportunity will be furnished for Electors to become acquainted with the sentiments and conduct of their Representatives, so as not to be under the necessity of acting wholly in the dark in the execution of the right of suffrage.

I am apprehensive that recent experience has taught us that it is not necessary at this day to lower the ratio, for the purpose last mentioned. From a uniform practice upon the present ratio, which has now become familiar, and the repeated elections which have taken place under it, the object mentioned seems to have been already attained. It is obvious, I suppose, that a very considerable change has lately taken place in the political sentiments of our fellow-citizens throughout the United States. This change of sentiment is supposed by many to be for the better, and that it has been effected by the diffusion of information among the people, and a more thorough and competent acquaintance with the sentiments and characters of their Representatives and candidates. Those, therefore, who believe that such interesting and salutary effects have occurred from a uniform practice on the present ratio, and that the effects of the same practice are meliorating from year to year, and from one election to another; such, I say, who believe this to be our case while practising on the present ratio, cannot consistently, as I conceive, wish to have it altered with a view to try a different one, since this has been found to answer the end desired.

There are others, no doubt, who verily believe that the former days were better than these, and that the elections that were made on the present ratio, when it bore a much greater proportion to the whole number of citizens than it now does, were more wisely conducted, and that they were attended with much more salutary effects than those are which lately have been made. Those who are of this opinion, I must suppose, cannot consistently wish to lower the ratio, so that it may bear a still less proportion to the whole number of citizens than it even now does, for this would tend to enhance and not to remedy the evil complained of. Let the subject, then, be viewed in either of those lights which have now been mentioned, and I cannot see but that if we act consistently, as I presume we shall, that it will be almost the unanimous opinion of the Committee that it is not expedient to adopt the motion, and to strike out the number 33, with a view to insert 30.

It has been suggested that we ought to increase the representation, because we shall thereby increase the confidence of the people in the Government. I suspect this to be a reason that exists in theory rather than in fact. So far as my observation has extended, I have not found that the confidence of a people in their government is always in proportion to the number of those who administer it; nor yet that the confidence which is reposed in the different departments of the same Government is in exact proportion to the numbers which compose those departments respectively. How is it in our own Governments, both National and State? I need not descend to a minute comparison; I will only observe that, by showing a disposition to increase our own numbers beyond what is necessary, would, in my opinion, tend rather to diminish than to increase the confidence of the people in their Government.

Mr. DAVIS.—Two ratios are brought to our view, those of 30,000 and 33,000. The former leaves unrepresented fractions amounting to 15,700; the latter leaves fractions amounting to 221,000. It would be most equitable to adopt the former but for its operation upon a number of States. Six States, of which Kentucky is one, will be peculiarly affected by it. They will relatively lose their portion of representation in a great degree. They will lose as many members as the ten remaining States, whereas by the ratio of 33,000 the evil will be, as to those States, greatly diminished. For this reason, notwithstanding the unpleasant situation of Delaware, Mr. D. must vote for the ratio of 33,000.

Mr. MACON never had considered this as a consolidated Government, which might be inferred from the arguments of some gentlemen. The Constitution established a directly opposite principle. It declared the Constitution to be established for the United States, not for the people; and in all its parts it bore a Federal complexion. In the arguments made use of when it was adopted, it had always been declared by its friends to be Federal; and the Representatives were particularly designated as the Representatives of particular States.

Mr. M. did not think 30,000 too small a ratio. He wished the people to know their Representatives, and the more numerous the last were, the greater was the chance of this knowledge; nor did he think that the enlarged representation would augment the expenses of the Government. The House knew he had never been prodigal of public money. He believed we should save money by an enlarged representation, for the public expenses did not proceed so much from the compensation rendered to the members of this House, as from the adoption of improper measures, which an enlarged representation would defeat.

With regard to the abstract arguments made, did not the dispute about different numbers show that we are all the Representatives of particular States? Else, why take Delaware as the minimum and Virginia as the maximum? This demonstrated the question to be one entirely of calculation.

Mr. S. SMITH had listened to the discourses of gentlemen on the abstract question introduced, and yet he had found that every gentleman, before he sat down, proved himself to be the Representative of a particular State, after all that he had said. The truth was, the point was one altogether of calculation. The gentleman from Connecticut had been strong for 40,000; and now, after making his calculation, he agrees with his friend from Delaware in preferring 30,000; not, perhaps, because it peculiarly benefits Connecticut, but because it benefits the party with whom he acts. Let us view the gentleman from Delaware, and we see him pursuing the interests of Delaware, and caring nothing for other States, and thus he shows us that he is the Representative of the State of Delaware. The gentleman from North Carolina, heretofore always economical of the public money, is for once prodigal in wishing an enlarged representation; and why? Because he thereby will promote the interest of his State. This was perfectly fair and right; and if he, Mr. S., were similarly situated he should act in the same way. But, Maryland happened to be differently situated. The ratio of 30,000 would leave a fraction to her of 29,000. Could it, therefore, be expected that any member of that State would be for that ratio?

Mr. SMILIE observed that he had originally been in favor of the ratio of 33,000, from the influence of general principles. But since one gentleman had shifted from 40,000 to 30,000, from considerations of policy, and other gentlemen seemed to feel the same motives, he thought it was high time for each State to take care of itself. He would, therefore, vote for the ratio of 33,000.

Mr. DANA said he would not question the purity of the principles of the gentleman from Maryland or Pennsylvania. Yet he must say that, however honorable to the frankness of character of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, was the avowal of his sentiments, yet it did no honor to the principles of equity which ought to govern that House. As to the question of confidence or consolidation, he deemed it a mere question of words. It was right that we should consult the interests of our constituents, because we were better acquainted with them than with those of the other States. But that we should exclusively consult them, to the disregard of the general principles of justice, of the great interests of the United States; such a principle ought not to be tolerated. Though the question was, in a great measure, one of calculation, yet he was astonished at an avowal of one gentleman to conform to unjust principles because another gentleman had in his opinion adopted the same course.

Mr. D. then went into a detailed comparison of the different bearings of the two ratios, from which he was in favor of 30,000.

He then proceeded. The question between the two ratios is not simply important as it relates to this House; but as it settles the relative weight of the States in the election of our two first Executive magistrates. Just as you diminish the ratio you increase the weight of the large States; and this may be done until you shall give the large States the entire monopoly of Executive power. He would not say that the large States were not entitled to a monopoly of this power. He would not say that a majority of talents and virtue correspondent to the magnitude of the States, did not subsist; but until he was sure of this, he would not be for conferring a monopoly of power on four States. Those States being the most important, it may be thought right to take the Chief Executive Magistrate from them, and the other chief officers; and this may become so much a matter of course, that it may be deemed injurious to disturb the established harmony of things. For these reasons Mr. D. was against the ratio which gave undue weight to the large States.

Mr. EVSTIS said, there was a sound principle which applied itself to the elucidation of this question. The present ratio had given general satisfaction. As to the abstract questions which had been discussed, they were wholly immaterial. Let us go back and view the circumstances under which this House was organized. It was so constituted as to afford the people of the United States an opportunity of expressing their feelings and representing their interests. Has any inconvenience resulted from the ratio of thirty-three thousand, long since adopted? Has it not been recommended by experience? And will not any desire to augment the representation be fully satisfied by the increase from one hundred and six to one hundred and forty-two? Whether the number was great or small, he had no idea that the powers of the House could receive correspondent augmentation or diminution. He believed that a body of fifty men would not want decision to oppose unconstitutional encroachments, and that a body of one thousand would not dare to transcend Constitutional powers.

Though he felt for the situation of Delaware, yet, if the principle was correct that the ratio of thirty-three thousand would constitute a body sufficiently large, we must, of necessity, abandon any particular regard to that State.

H. OF R.

Connecticut Reserve—Perfect Motion.

JANUARY, 1802.

There was another circumstance worthy of mention. A diminution of power was abhorrent to all bodies. If a great increase of the members of the House increased its power, and a precedent be now set of greatly enlarging our number, it may be followed in future, until the House becomes so large as to render it a nuisance.

The Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, January 5.

A memorial of sundry aliens, residing in the city and county of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, was presented to the House, and read, praying a repeal of an act of Congress, passed the eighteenth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, entitled "An act supplementary to, and to amend, the act entitled 'An act to establish an uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the act heretofore passed on that subject,'" which was referred to the committee appointed, on the fifteenth ultimo, to prepare and bring in bill or bills for a revision and amendment of the laws respecting naturalization.

CONNECTICUT RESERVE.

A petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of Pennsylvania, settled on the lands claimed under grants from the State of Connecticut antecedent to the trial before the Court of Commissioners between the States of Pennsylvania and Connecticut, was presented to the House, and read, praying that the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States to re-examine and reverse or affirm a final judgment or decree in the cases provided for in the 25th section of the Judiciary act, may be extended or declared already to extend to cases of criminal prosecutions as well as of civil actions; that original and exclusive jurisdiction may, agreeably to the Constitution, be given to the proper courts of the United States in all controversies between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States; and that the Supreme Court may be empowered, at their discretion, to direct the trial of such causes, to be holden in districts other than the States in which the two opposite titles are claimed, (unless the claimant under the other than that in which the land is, shall waive the right of trial in a Federal court,) or that some other adequate relief may be granted in respect to the disputed claims of the petitioners for the lands aforesaid.

Mr. GODDARD moved to refer the petition to the committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of making any alterations in the Judicial Establishment of the United States.

Those who supported the reference were Mr. GODDARD, Mr. BAYARD, Mr. T. MORRIS, Mr. BACON, Mr. HEMPHILL, and Mr. RUTLEDGE.

Those who opposed the reference were Mr. SMILIE and Mr. RANDOLPH.

In support of the reference it was declared that all petitions couched in decent terms, ought to be referred, else the House would be precipitated into decisions without possessing correct information; that this case was important in its effects upon a large class of citizens, who had a right to be attended to by Congress; that the controversy to which the petition related, was of long standing, and that it became that House to treat the prayer of the memorialists with respect; that it was believed that Congress neither could or would interpose; and that, if such were the determination of Congress, expressed after mature consideration, it would tend more effectually than a present suppression of the petition to deprive the memorialists of any expectations derived from the hoped-for interposition of the Federal Legislature; that, in this result, Pennsylvania was as deeply interested as the petitioners.

On the other hand, it was declared that Congress had no power to interfere; that the question was entirely judicial, and had been decided by the first judicial authorities of the nation; that the rights of Pennsylvania were conclusively established; and that Congress could do nothing that would impair them.

A reference at last obtained, by general consent, under the suggestion that the memorial prayed for a revision of the Judiciary System, so far as relates to the selection of juries.

PERFECT MOTION.

A memorial was presented from Lewis Dupre, of which the following is a copy:

To the Government of the United States in Congress assembled.

DEAR FRIENDS: It has pleased Almighty God (for purposes most extensively benevolent) to discover to me the principles of the perfect motion, (vulgarly called perpetual motion,) for which I trust I am thankful, (as, no doubt, every citizen of the super-eminently favored land of Columbia ought to be,) for the peculiar blessing.

In prosecuting a suit for the customarily exclusive pecuniary advantages which the practice of ancient liberality has established, as the reward of persevering ingenuity and industry, I meet with difficulties insurmountable without the aid of Legislative interference.

I, therefore, trust that your justice and republican patriotism will induce you to take the subject into consideration, and as speedily as possible obtain, from the critical casket where it remains deposited, the precious bounty, to effectuate which you hereby possess a promise of the cordial co-operation of your real friend and fellow-citizen,

LEWIS DUPRE.

50th day of perfect motion, Jan. 1, 1802.

On the motion to refer the above petition to a select committee.

Mr. MITCHILL said, if there was a case in which it was proper to decide against the reference of a petition to a committee, that was such an one. It was evident on the face of the petition just read, that it was a strange, disordered composition; and the object which the petitioner pretended to have attained, was contrary to the physical laws of matter. All experience and all philosophy was opposed to the notions of the kind contained in the paper before the House. He hoped there would be no reference of such a visionary scheme to any committee whatever. It was not worthy of the National Legislature to give a serious attention to physical impossibilities.

After some debate about the disposal of the petition, it was ordered to be referred to a select committee; and Mr. SOUTHARD, Mr. LOWNDES, and Mr. MITCHILL, were appointed.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the second enumeration.

Mr. BAYARD said, he should beg the indulgence, before the question was taken, of a few observations in reply to the arguments of the gentlemen opposed to him. The peculiar interest in the subject which attached to his State would apologize for the trouble he had given the Committee. It had been said that Delaware ought to be satisfied; that, if she had ground to complain of the want of a complete representation on this floor, the equality she enjoyed in the Senate, and her weight in the election of President, were juster grounds of umbrage to the larger States. He was surprised at such an intimation.

The Constitution had settled the political pretensions of the States, and each one had a right to insist upon the full advantages which justly belonged to it on Constitutional grounds. Delaware was satisfied with the Constitution; but it was not to be expected she would yield a pretension she could rightfully claim.

In the present instance, what was insisted on, he could demonstrate to be equitable.

It was only asked, that the State should be represented in the proportion she was taxed, in the proportion she supported the burdens of the Union.

In the apportionment of the direct tax lately levied upon the United States, the quota of Delaware, relative to Virginia, was as one to eleven; relative to Pennsylvania, as one to seven. The apportionment of representation upon the ratio adopted by the present bill, was in relation to Virginia, as one to twenty-two; and in relation to Pennsylvania, as one to eighteen.

He would appeal to the candor of the House, if it could be just that the proportion of taxation should be double the proportion of representation. The Constitution had connected them, and evidently contemplated their proceeding in the same progression.

He could not help indulging a hope, that neither the apathy nor the interests of the larger States would induce them to oppose the justice of a case which was so glaring.

He would add, on this head, that the white population of Virginia, in relation to Delaware, did not exceed the proportion of nine to one; and he did not believe that a greater portion was paid by Virginia of the taxes derived from excises and the duties upon imports, which composed the principal pecuniary burden of the United States.

In the militia requisitions, Delaware stood, in relation to Virginia, as one to ten; in relation to Pennsylvania, as one to nine. In short, turning his views to every object, he could discover no equality between the burdens supported and the representation allowed to Delaware by the present bill. On the contrary, the ratio of her burdens was, in all cases, double; and in many, more than double that of her representation.

Some gentlemen had asserted that it was indifferent to what part of the nation the unrepresented fraction belonged, whether to a small or to a large State.

If, said Mr. B., we had interests as a nation only, and not as States, the assertion might be correct. But was he to be told it was the same thing to Virginia, whether she had twenty-two or twenty-three members, as it was to Delaware, whether she had one or two? With a view to every State consideration, the loss of a member to Delaware was equal to the loss of eleven to Virginia. Suppose Virginia to have twenty-two representatives, Delaware two, and the other States in their several proportions, and a general agreement is made to strike off one-half of the representation. The loss to Delaware would be one member, to Virginia eleven, and the other States in proportion.

Mr. B. said, he might console himself and comfort his constituents, if it were practicable, and gentlemen were disposed to equalize the ratio of taxation with that of representation. But of this he had no hope, either as a thing feasible under the Constitution, or as a thing to which the House would be ever brought to consent. He had no other resource, than to rely that the magnanimity of the larger States would protect from injustice and oppression their smallest and weakest sister.

Mr. B. said, he was not governed in the opinion he had adopted in relation to the ratio by the consideration solely of State interest. His great object was to augment the members of the Representative branch of the Government. He believed that the strength of the National Government existed in that House; and by increasing the members of this House, its weight and strength were augmented. He confessed it to be his object to make the General Government so strong as to be able, with equal certainty, to control the largest as the smallest States. It was now able to govern the small States; but if one of the largest should deny and resist the authority of the Union, he doubted the ability of the Government to enforce obedience to its laws. He had occasionally advocated an increase of Executive authority. He had then been charged with views unfriendly to republicanism. He was now contending for an increase of the weight of the popular branch of the Government.

He was actuated by the same motive which had always induced him to give his support to the Executive. His uniform object had been, and would continue to be, to maintain the independence of the General Government, and to render it efficient enough to curb the ambition, and to repress the dominating spirit which was inseparable from the large States. His voice had never been to vary the relative powers of the Executive and Representative branches; but generally by increasing the strength to confirm the stability of the Government. An opportunity now presented itself of promoting the same object by augmenting the weight of the popular branch; he embraced it with more zeal than he had ever felt in the support of the Executive prerogative. He rejoiced in an occasion which enabled him to manifest, that the true object of his views was not inimical to the equal rights and Constitutional liberties of his country.

He was firmly convinced that the House of Representatives was, and necessarily would be, the main pillar of the General Government. While this branch retained the attachment and possessed the confidence of the nation, the Government would endure, but if any State could succeed in weaning the affections of the people from this House, and transferring their confidence exclusively to the States, the Government would perish. He wished to enlarge the field of action and employment under this Government. So small a number occupy the ground upon the floor of this House, that the talents and ambition of the mass of men aspiring to distinction are directed to State objects, and seeking the aggrandizement of the States, eventually become hostile to the General Government. The representation of the country was too sparse, it was not sufficiently united and bound to the bosom of the nation.

The same sympathy and confidence did not subsist between a Representative and a constituent when widely separated. Under the State governments, the representatives proceeded from every neighborhood. They were well known, connected by common interests and friendship, and thence enjoyed the entire confidence of their constituents. Whereas, a Representative in this House is known by name only, to the greater number of those who elect him.

This evil will always remain, but it may be diminished. A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) expressed his apprehensions that, by augmenting the members of this House, the splendor of the State Legislatures would be obscured, and they might ultimately dwindle into insignificance. Mr. B. said, that it was certainly strange that when Virginia alone had a House of Representatives composed of 190 members, such an apprehension should be expressed, when it was proposed to allow to all the United States only 156. In her State Legislature, Virginia would have 190 members, when her representation here would consist only of twenty-four.

It had been insinuated that he was unfriendly to the State governments. He declared the insinuation to be without the smallest foundation. On the contrary, his principles and conduct demonstrated his attachment to those governments. The safety of the State governments reposed upon the strength of the General Government. The Constitution expressly guaranties the integrity of the States. He could conceive of no motive which could lead to the abolition of the State governments. Suppose them abolished, what advantage would the inhabitants of a small State derive. They are melted down into a national mass, but they acquire nothing which they did not enjoy before, nor anything which every one does not enjoy in common with them. The insinuation supposes some greater advantage or greater honor, in living in a large State than in a small one. Of any such thing, he was not in the smallest degree sensible. He felt the same satisfaction, and was quite as proud to represent the State of Delaware, as he could be to represent a district of Virginia. If the case was otherwise, and he could feel any little pride in saying he belonged to a large State, it was a feeling which a trifling change of place might gratify. But, said Mr. B., the people of the small States have as great a stake in their governments as those of the large.

Upon those governments depend their peculiar laws, their moral and religious institutions, which have fashioned their manners, and habits, and sentiments, and opinions. It is impossible to imagine that the people of any State would be willing to see the system of rights and obligations, of wrongs and remedies, belonging to private life, which has been hallowed and consecrated by antiquity and usage, liable to be broken down by the powers of a General Government.

Is this supposed, too, to be the project of the Eastern gentlemen? For his part, he was infinitely more apprehensive, that the disposition of the Eastern people was to separate, rather than politically to amalgamate themselves with the Southern.

Taking an opposite view of the subject, Mr. B. said, he could discover motives which might lead the aspiring men of large States to seek the depression of the General Government. The General Government removed, they stood like the lofty oaks among the brambles of the forest.

All experience had shown political bodies, equally with individuals, stimulated or impelled by the passion of aggrandizement. It was possible for the great States to see an interest in the depression or dissolution of the Federal Union; but it was impossible for the small States to derive an advantage from the abolition of the State authorities. The danger, therefore, to be apprehended, was a dissolution of the Union by the large States, and not a consolidation by the small.

It had been denied by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that this House represented the people of the United States; and asserted that we are to be considered on this floor as the Representatives of the people of the States. By this he understood that the representation of each State were to be considered as representing only the people of their own State. This doctrine he considered as repugnant to the nature of the Government, and tending to efface its leading features. The gentleman had recourse, for the support of his position, to the words of the Constitution, which declare that the Representatives should be chosen "by the people of the several States."

In fact, by the laws of the several States, and particularly of Virginia, the Representatives were chosen in districts; and if there was anything in the gentleman's argument, the members from that State ought not to be severally considered Representatives of the State, but of the particular districts for which they were chosen.

Mr. B. here quoted the provisions on the same subject, of the constitutions of Virginia, North Carolina, and Pennsylvania; and remarked that the expression more strongly confined the election of the members of the State Legislatures to persons residing in the several counties; and observed that there would be the same propriety in contending that the members of the State Legislatures were not to be considered as representatives of the whole State, but each of the respective county by which he was chosen.

Much had been said about consolidation, with little attention to the subject to which the term was applied. Nobody could deny that the General Government was a consolidated Government, to the extent of its powers. The States remained unconsolidated, but the powers delegated to the General Government were consolidated. Within the sphere of its power, there was the same unity of action as in the State governments. The Government was created for national purposes, and was constructed on national principles. Its powers are limited, but, in the exercise of its powers, it acts as a national, and not as a federate body. Mr. B. here read the letter of General WASHINGTON to the President of the Old Congress, announcing the adoption of the Constitution; and particularly remarked on the following: "In all deliberations on this subject we kept steadily in view, that which appears to us the general interest of every true American, the consolidation of our Union, in which is involved our prosperity, felicity, and safety, perhaps our national existence."

The sentiments of the letter maintained the doctrines for which he contended. It was the source of peculiar gratification to have the support of an authority which once commanded universal respect, and for which his own reverence had not in the smallest degree abated.

Mr. B. said, he had been reproached with a wish to increase the power of the Government; that failing, to increase the power of one branch, as a last resort, an attempt was now made to increase that of another. Nothing could be more unfounded than this charge. The measure he proposed added nothing to the powers of any branch of the Government. It was simply to increase the number of hands in which the existing power was to be deposited. The point of difference between him and the gentlemen opposed to him, was, that he was desirous of committing the powers of the Government to a greater, and they to a smaller number. He wished to multiply the representatives of the people; they to diminish. Whether the House consisted of one hundred or of one hundred and fifty members, the powers of the Government remained the same, though probably a power exercised by 150 would be more likely to be attended with effect, than if supported only by 100.

Mr. B. concluded, with a brief recapitulation and application of the general points of the argument.

Mr. MITCHILL said, he hoped the motion would not prevail. He wished the interests, the rights, and even the feelings of the people of America, to be fairly and fully represented. But he was by no means persuaded that this desirable object would be, in any sensible degree, promoted by the motion before the Committee. The bill contemplates the establishment of the ratio of representation, which the citizens of the United States shall have in this branch of the National Legislature. Various ideas had been entertained and stated, concerning the nature and object of this Legislature. It had been urged by one gentleman that States only were represented here. It had been contended by another, that the members of this House, though chosen by States, ought to be totally detached from State influence. He believed neither of these conclusions were strictly correct. His own opinion was, that the Federal Constitution was an institution for which there was no example in history. In vain was any Government like it looked for among the Republics of ancient Greece. The Achæan league was, indeed, a noble, though inefficient attempt, at something of the kind. In modern Italy, warfare and contention had generally kept the Republics at variance; and the struggles between the rival Powers of Genoa and Venice, had manifested as uneasy a spirit abroad, as the Athenians and Florentines had shown at home. Even among the Swiss and the Grisons, there was a confederation of States, and not a representation of them, in a general council. The cantons of Helvetia were a mere confederacy of Republics; that is, a leaguering together of distinct and independent sovereignties, by compacts and treaties, for the safety of the contracting parties. But there was no general council of the nation. In the United Netherlands, some approach towards a form of government had been made; yet the system was immature and imperfectly elaborated.

In America, the organization of the political system was widely different. Here, different colonies had been settled and provinces conquered, under European Governments. They grew and prospered as dependents upon a transatlantic sovereign. In process of time, oppression threatened them with her iron rod, and they declared, with one voice, they would be free. Instantly each colony and province was erected into a free and independent commonwealth. The pressure of external foes forced them all to combine in a common cause. A sense of impending danger made it necessary for all those newly erected sovereignties to associate for the purposes of general defence. They bound themselves by an article of agreement for that great purpose, and associated themselves, as well as they could. But the coalition was too lax and incoherent to endure long. As soon as peace was made, and the fleets and armies of the enemy were withdrawn, the Congress was found to be nerveless, and without power.

Another attempt was made to meliorate the plan of the General Government. And the result of that effort, is the present happy and unexampled Constitution under which we are assembled; a form of policy without parallel in the annals of nations. For here, the commonwealths of America, reserving to themselves the right of sovereignty as to local, individual, and internal affairs of each, send Representatives to this House, to deliberate upon the more extended, general, and exterior matters which are interesting to them all. It is only in relation to this latter object, that the establishments and powers of the House of Representatives ought to be contemplated. And this object was particularly defined in the Constitution of the United States. So far as power was given by that Magna Charta of our liberties, and no further, did the Legislative powers of this body extend. The great regulations by which the security of our reputation, our property, and our lives, were guaranteed, rested chiefly with the State Legislatures; and he was happy he had left all those invaluable rights provided for, and well preserved at home. For the regulation of the principal part of territorial and local concerns, involving the right of individuals, and the relation of these to things, as well as the modes of preventing and punishing crimes, he was perfectly satisfied that the requisite power and wisdom resided in the respective States; and there it ought to reside. How, then, is this House constituted? By the States, whose qualified inhabitants chose Representatives. For what object is it constituted? To deliberate upon those general questions, merely, which are expressed in the Constitution, and are truly of a federal, universal, or national nature.

He considered such a Government as of a new and peculiar construction. It had been called by some, "Federal;" he questioned the correctness of that term, as both the words federal and confederated, if regard was had to their etymology and derivation, meant a connexion of independent States by treaties. By others, it had been termed a sort of consolidation, as respected a number of great and leading objects. He believed that there might be some hesitation at admitting either of these terms. It was certainly not a confederacy of States; and it was no less evident it was not a consolidation. This peculiar Government, for which, as far as his recollection went, there hardly existed an appropriate name, seemed to him a kind of political partnership, where each of the parties concerned, besides a separate interest, has a joint interest in the common stock.

Now, these conjoint interests are so blended and mingled together, that, in the important points of general welfare and common defence, there is a community extending to the whole; and so analogous are the predominating benefits to be derived from this organization, that, on the great outlines of the subject, there is a remarkable similitude of sentiment. From the limited extent of the Constitutional powers of this House, a very small representation, that of thirty thousand, had been thought sufficient by the framers of the Constitution. And from the community of interest in the greater part of the subjects delegated to them by the States, there would be seldom a difference about principles, but the variations, whatever they were, would exist, in the modes and forms of doing things.

Considering how comparatively few things this House had to attend to, he thought that ratio a large one. At the close of the former census, a preceding Congress had thought so. They even determined to lessen it, by declaring that one for every thirty-three thousand was enough. He believed the interests and liberties of the citizens were sufficiently secured at that ratio. If he had any reason to doubt this, he would consent to enlarge the number to the utmost of the limits of the Constitution. But ten years experience had shown that the representation had been not only equal, but adequate. He had not heard of complaints abroad upon this subject. He believed the citizens were satisfied with it. He thought that public opinion and public confidence had been so long accustomed to the ratio of thirty-three thousand to one Representative, that it was at least useless, it possibly might be injurious, to change it.

Judging upon the matter on principle, he considered thirty thousand for one, as a large allowance; and now, aided by experience, he was convinced one to thirty-three was not too small. He had stated to the House, in a former debate, his opinion on a too numerous Legislative body. He should not repeat what he then had advanced; but only observe that, in an excessive representation, there certainly would be more expense and less dispatch in business. As to the State of New York, whence he had the honor to come, there had been lately a strong expression of the sense of the citizens on this subject. In a convention lately held for the purpose, it was ordained that the ratio of representation should be lessened in the branches of the Legislature.

Much had been said concerning the large fraction in the State of Delaware. This was to him a matter of secondary importance. This fraction, and all other fractions, would be virtually represented in the proposed ratio, as well as in any other that could be proposed. The peculiar and exquisite manner in which that House was constituted, gave every one of its members an interest in the whole of the national concerns before them. And it was the privilege and the duty of a member from New York, to consult the welfare of Maine and Tennessee; and of the members from those States to consult for the good of all the other States.

This community of interest, he contended, went so far, that even, in the case of laying a direct tax, that House could not, without violating the Constitution, cause Delaware to pay more of it than her rateable proportion. The census gave the number of her inhabitants, and beyond the amount of her population, it was not in the power of Congress to make her pay. And this rule would be inviolably regarded, even if her Representative should, by sickness or any unavoidable accident, be prevented from attending in his place.

Great apprehensions had been expressed of the overbearing disposition of the larger States. He believed nothing had been advanced, during the session, so chimerical. The fears about rapacity, selfishness, and dominion, were visionary. When New York, a strong and powerful State, surrendered her impost, and poured her wealth into the national treasury, was that rapacity? In this magnanimous act, was there anything that looked like selfishness? Was the delivery of the key into the hand of the nation, a grasping for dominion? No; there was nothing like it; nor was there any probability that such proceedings would ever happen. The smaller States were the most benefited by the ratification of the present Constitution. They were accordingly the first to adopt it. And they had uniformly found it a system, not of oppression, but of protection; and that protection would never, with his consent, be withdrawn from them.

In the course of his remarks, Mr. M. animated on the proposition made some time since, in the State of Delaware, to abolish the sovereignty of that State, and to merge it in that of an adjoining State.

Mr. BAYARD said, that he would furnish the House with some information respecting the proposition alluded to by the gentleman from New York. The proposition had been made. He would inform the House by whom it had been made, and what were the motives of those who made it. It had been made by a set of men once called Jacobins, then Democrats, and who now called themselves Republicans. It had been opposed by the Federalists, who, having most strength, frustrated it. It had been the desire and effort of the former description of men to get all the offices of the State into their hands, in which, having failed, they wished to be annexed to Pennsylvania, where democratic principles held sway.

Mr. VAN NESS.—After the great display of talents and abilities which we have had upon this subject, it is not to be expected that I shall rise to detain you more than a moment or two. I have attended, sir, with great deference and respect to all the gentlemen who have been up before me. I have heard an eloquent discussion, extremely entertaining and improving, but which, being rather too much confined to abstract principles, I think, has not been, in all its parts, immediately applicable to the question before us.

Gentlemen, sir, surely deserve credit for their candor, at least, who avow their motives to be local prepossessions or partialities. Considerations of this kind, particular attachments, appear, indeed, too operative in the present case; but, sir, I think, and I believe the sentiment is common to a majority of my colleagues, that we ought not to be wholly actuated by such motives. We have heard much upon the question, whether we are the Representatives of the States, or of the people of the different States, or whether we are the Representatives of the whole people of the United States? I must confess, sir, that the moment I enter this House, I consider myself as bound by general obligations towards the whole nation. My obligations and duties extend to all the United States; and in an act of national legislation, I do not feel myself justified in consulting the particular and more immediate interest of any individual State, as contradistinguished from those of the others. No arrangements tending in its result to general benefit or advantage, ought to be varied or rejected, merely upon the ground of partial inconvenience to any particular State. This doctrine savors too much of the narrowness of that contracted illiberality which ought never to govern the mind of the Legislature. He should take extensive views of his subject, and be influenced only by a liberal policy.

Our Government is, after all, but a Government of experiment. We have opened a new road to ourselves, and are travelling on in it without knowing, to a certainty, what dangers may await us by the way. We should therefore, sir, proceed

“With cautious steps, and slow.”

We have been, in number, as low as 65. We have increased to 106. We now propose to rise to 141, (at 33,000;) that is, to considerably more than a duplication in about thirteen or fourteen years. Is not this, sir, advancing with pretty rapid strides? We all acknowledge we must stop somewhere.

There is a certain point, sir, that point where security and convenience for the transaction of public business meet, which we must not pass; if we do, we may find it difficult and embarrassing to recede. The constitution of human nature is such, that we are all gratified with the enjoyment and exercise of power. Tell the people they shall choose a certain number of Representatives; and if, upon experiment, it is found too large, you will find it difficult to diminish. We may hesitate, ourselves; we may not be disposed to lessen our chances of re-election. The people will hesitate to relinquish or abridge their right. And, sir, if once we have plunged ourselves into the dilemma of too numerous a representation, all the dreadful evils incident to such a state, and which, in a particular instance, excites the sensibility of some gentlemen, may be produced before a preventive can be adopted.

I confess, sir, I am one of those who, though differing in this particular from some gentlemen on this side of the House, whose opinions I highly respect, believe that an increase of members in a public body, to a certain extent, will increase the confidence of the community in that body. I do not mean, sir, such an increase as would exceed the line that I have before marked out, and which would expose the body alternately to ridicule and contempt, and to the dangerous operation of those licentious and ungovernable passions which frequently rage in society; but a moderate, reasonable augmentation, such a one as is calculated and adapted to secure the advantages incident to a wholesome deliberative assembly. I say, sir, in this case, an increase of members will generally increase confidence; and that confidence will be attended with a correspondent augmentation of powers, since the Representative body will have a greater influence over the physical force of the community. It certainly, sir, appears to me that we ought to be extremely careful how we increase this power in the General Government. I believe, sir, with many others, that the influence of that Government has been bearing very hard upon the State governments. I believe, sir, whatever was the theory, that the practice, for some time, has tended to the substantial reduction of the State governments. I believe this has been the policy, and perhaps consistently with their principles, of some who have borne a conspicuous part in the administration of our Government; but, I flatter myself, the doctrine is exploded. In this view, that is, with respect to the State governments, I do not wish to see our own powers too much increased in the augmented numbers of this House.

I do not wish to see the State Governments, which I regard, indeed, as the pillars on which the fabric of our liberty rests, drawn within and swallowed up by the vortex of Federal power and influence. In another view, I do not wish to see the powers of this House imprudently enlarged, by too rapid an increase of members. The established theory of our Constitution I admire; I adore it; I believe the arrangement and distribution of power among the several branches of the Government is, in the main, salutary and correct. The equilibrium is well established, and may continue, whilst we are careful not to add too great a weight to either branch. But, sir, give this House too decided a preponderance, by means of its numbers, increased public confidence, and its consequent increased strength, and you hazard all.

We have seen melancholy instances of public evils resulting from struggles for power between different branches of the same political establishment. When, by accident, intrigue, or other circumstances, the physical power of a people has been more peculiarly and completely attached or devoted to one of those branches, we have frequently beheld it, conscious of this advantage, and under the influence of the most dangerous passions, sweep everything before it that opposed the gratification of those passions. I need not particularize; the history of every country that has ever enjoyed even a semblance of liberty, where there has been even a pretended division or distribution of power, will furnish us with cases. I do, therefore, feel a strong regard, a strong solicitude for the preservation and permanent firmness of the other branches of the present Government, whilst I am augmenting the numbers, confidence, and power, of this House. We are at present, and, by a moderate progression, will continue, a sufficient counterbalance to the other branches. If we practise upon the pure principles of the Constitution, I am persuaded it is so.

But, sir, it is said by some gentlemen, that the difference for which we contend, is trifling; neither on the score of economy, or any other, can it be material, &c. I confess, the number of fifteen, abstractedly, is not very large; but is not the addition of thirty-five members, which will be the increase, according to the ratio of 33,000, a considerable one? Is it not large, when compared to the whole number of members? Will not this satisfy the country? When our population was three millions, our representation on this floor consisted of sixty-five members. When our population was nearly four millions, our number of Representatives here was one hundred and six, and so continued until the present day. When our population appears to be five millions, shall we call for one hundred and fifty-six, in direct violation of the principle heretofore established, instead of one hundred and forty-one, which will be the number afforded by the divisor of 33,000, and which is the number we ask for.

I repeat, sir, we must rest somewhere; we cannot long proceed at this rapid rate of increase, in direct proportion to our population. And it appears more reasonable, more politic, gradually to lessen our proportional increase, until we arrive, by a moderate progression, at an ultimatum, than to proceed in full career, and with an intemperate zeal for increase; and thus presently do violence to the habits and expectations of the country, by a sudden, an abrupt discontinuance.

I would therefore prefer even a larger ratio than 33,000 to 30,000, but this not appearing desirable to any part of the House, I shall adhere to that number which appears to me most proper and consistent of any that has been under consideration. As I have before said, I respect the feelings and sentiments of the public upon every occasion, particularly upon the present, when we are upon a subject more interesting to them than any other object of legislation. They are generally right. Taking, necessarily, a strong interest in public affairs, after having bestowed due deliberation and reflection upon a subject, they arrive at the truth. This remark applies to an enlightened country, a country like our own. I consider their opinions as unequivocally expressed, in the first instance, by our Constitution, which directs that the number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every 30,000, even at the period of its formation, when our population was so much inferior to the present, clearly implying that even in that state of our population, this ratio was fully low enough; and, of course, that as the population advanced, the ratio or divisor ought to be increased: by the law of Congress passed very soon afterwards, and after the taking of the first census, which, pursuing this principle, raised the ratio to 33,000, by the recommendation of Congress, (two-thirds of both Houses concurring,) of an article, by way of amendment, to the Constitution, regulating, in effect, the ratio by the population. Here, indeed, some gentlemen triumphantly exclaim: "But that recommended article was rejected; it was not adopted by three-fourths of the States." Those gentlemen, however, should recollect that it was not rejected on account of its principle. It contained, probably through the inadvertence of its framers, a proposition which was inconsistent and contradictory in itself. By the terms of it, after the number of Representatives should have amounted to two hundred, the proportion was to have been so regulated that there were not to be less than two hundred members, nor more than one for every 30,000; whereas it might have happened from the state of population, that taking the ratio (the least possible, according to the proposed article) the number of members would have fallen short of two hundred. Here, then, in the same breath, it was proposed that the number of members should not be less, and that it might be less than two hundred. To this intrinsic defect in the form, and not to the radical principle out of which it had grown, the proposed amendment owed its rejection. Notwithstanding all this imperfection of form, and perhaps substance, in which it was submitted, a number of States, though not, indeed, three-fourths, assented to it; and the concurrent evidence of the public sentiment in favor of the principle which I contend for, is the satisfaction of the country with the practice under that principle. I would, indeed, prefer a moderate increase of the ratio, as the most reasonable arrangement; but, since that seems not to be desirable by any part of this House, I shall adhere to 33,000; for to descend from that, appears, upon the ground of general principle, to be reversing the order of things, and to be in direct hostility to every idea of propriety.

The examples of particular States have been cited in favor of the more numerous representation; but I presume it will be recollected that, from the difference between the objects of State and those of Federal legislation, a correspondent difference may be proper in the relative proportion of representation. The one embraces the minute and particular interests of the different districts and parts of the individual States; the other, objects of a more general nature. In the one case, therefore, a more intimate local knowledge is requisite than in the other; and this is to be obtained only by a more numerous representation. In the State, however, which I have the honor to represent, after an experience of twenty-four years, and upon the most mature deliberation, they have lately reduced their limitation to one hundred and fifty members, in the popular branch, their present number consisting of a few more than one hundred. In the most important Eastern State, indeed, one of the most important in the Union, although they have a right to elect a number considerably larger than here contended for, still I believe that right, from political inconveniences, has frequently remained unexercised. And here, sir, permit me to add, (if I am mistaken the gentleman from that State will correct me,) that in the internal arrangement or apportionment of the Representatives from the different towns in that State, is observed the very principle for which we now contend; that, is an increase of ratio in some proportion to the increase of population or electors; and I think sixty members, whatever may be the whole eligible number which particular emergencies may draw forth, is a quorum to proceed to business. The same principle, that is, a proportionate increase of ratio, is adopted, I think, in New Hampshire. All the other States, perhaps one or two excepted, are below even our present number, in this popular branch; many of them very inferior indeed.

It has been strenuously urged and insisted upon, that every precaution ought to be taken to prevent a combination of the larger States against the smaller. That the former would always feel a strong disposition to oppress, and, finally, to crush the other. But are not those fears chimerical? How are they warranted by experience in similar cases? Why, most of the small States, or nations, in the world, are brought into existence, and afterwards supported and reared by the jealousies and enmities of the large ones, towards each other. They are not jealous of the weak, but of the strong; and neither of them will voluntarily suffer a powerful rival to accumulate a degree of strength, dangerous to herself. Hence has, for a long time, proceeded the safety of most of the small States in the world—I might instance, among others, Holland and Switzerland, in Europe—I might call the attention of this House to our own political history. And has not even the State of Delaware discovered in her sister States the most friendly, the most conceding disposition, on all important occasions? They will acknowledge the fact. Now and then, indeed, a solitary instance of a foolish division occurs; but they are rare; ambition, rapacity—those very passions that move the plunderers to the measure, generally produce a difference about a division of the spoil.

The gentleman from Delaware contends, that he is the Representative of all the United States; and still, the moment he views the fraction likely to remain to that State, his feelings seem to whisper to him, "you are the Representative only of Delaware;" for, if that gentleman will, for a moment, examine the general result to all the small States, in case of the division of 30,000, he will find that the aggregate fraction is larger than in the case of 33,000, and not smaller, as some gentlemen have erroneously stated. Gentlemen are very fearful, indeed, that the four larger States will obtain a majority of votes on this floor. What, sir, are the gentlemen Republicans? Do they pretend that the people ought to be represented, and a majority of them, so represented, ought not to govern? and are they not willing to allow, if a majority of the Constitutional electors of the country are found within any particular States or parts of the Union, that they should also have a majority on this floor? This is proceeding upon the true principles of representation, which, I presume, they are not ready to contest. The majority of population is unquestionably contained in those States. But the danger is idle. Among other reasons, we need not now repeat the disproportionate weight which the small States have in the choice of the other branch of the Legislature and of the Executive.

Something has been said about economy; that the difference in expense would be trifling, &c. This opinion comes, in one instance particularly, from a respectable quarter; but when I reflect that, besides the additional consumption of time which must necessarily result, there will be a saving, in the course of ten years, of between two and three hundred thousand dollars in the immediate pay of the members, I cannot think so lightly of it. I think it would make a respectable item in a list of retrenchments. I would not, indeed, sacrifice to this object any important advantages of a Representative Government; but there is no danger of such a consequence.

The gentleman from Delaware, in adverting to a struggle which, some time since, took place in his State, respecting a surrender of their sovereignty, acknowledged the fact, but very unnecessarily went on to tell us that the attempt was made by those who were formerly called Jacobins, afterwards Democrats, and who now call themselves Republicans. It is a little extraordinary, I confess, and only to be accounted for by local circumstances, unknown to us, that they should have had to contend in a struggle of this kind with a set of people formerly called Federalists; afterwards, Aristocrats; and now called Royalists. The opposition of this latter class cannot have been consistent with their usual principles; principles which, after full experience, have met with the public reprobation.

Mr. VAN RENSSLAER did not rise with a view to offer any arguments to the committee in expectation that any one member would be influenced thereby, so as to induce him to change his opinion different from what he had expressed on the floor of the House, or signified by a vote on the different questions that have been decided; but merely to express his opinion and to assign his reason for the vote he was about to give. When the question now before the Committee was first introduced into the House an honorable gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) moved to strike out the divisor 33,000, for the purpose of introducing 40,000; he voted for it, but the motion did not obtain. Circumstanced as he was, in the shape the business now stood before the Committee, he would vote for striking out 33,000, in hopes of obtaining a divisor of 40,000. In doing this he was actuated by the same motive that influenced him on a former occasion—that of opposing a too numerous representation. As to two of the reasons his colleague (Mr. VAN NESS) had offered in support of the present bill before the committee—the act of the House of Representatives, in the year 1793, fixing the ratio at 33,000, and the instance of the late convention in the State of New York lessening the State legislature—Mr. VAN R. said they made more in favor of the divisor of 40,000 than otherwise; for that the ratio of 33,000 for each member in 1793 was on three million, which made a very considerable augmentation to the House. In the present case the divisor ought to be received because we have at this time upwards of five million of souls. If, then, precedents and local considerations might be brought to bear on the present question, it certainly would give the preference to the divisor of 40,000 rather than 33,000.

Mr. S. SMITH, and Mr. LOWNDES followed, and assigned reasons in favor of the ratio of thirty-three thousand.

On the question being taken for striking out thirty-three, it was lost—yeas 42, nays 48.

Mr. DENNIS moved to strike out eight, the number of Representatives allotted to Maryland, and insert nine; which amendment had been rendered necessary by the supplementary return received from Maryland.

On this motion a very desultory debate took place, which was twice interrupted by motions for the Committee to rise, which were both lost.

Much personal recrimination, chiefly on the charge of delay on the one side, and precipitation on the other, was exchanged.

The amendment was at last agreed to—yeas 57.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill as amended.

The House immediately took up the report of the Committee, agreed to the amendments, and ordered the bill to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, January 6.

The bill for the apportionment of Representatives coming up for its third reading, a motion was made to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole, that certain returns of the new census, not made precisely according to law, might receive legislative sanction before the apportionment among the several States should be made.

[The Marshal of South Carolina had not taken the oath prescribed by law, though he took an oath some days after he made the return, that it was faithfully made.]

Mr. RUTLEDGE said he would not struggle against the sense of the House when unequivocally expressed. It had been determined yesterday not to strike out, for the purpose of not diminishing the ratios in the bill; but it had not been determined that the ratio should not be increased. Thirty-five thousand would be the most convenient ratio for the State he had the honor to represent, and he thought that number would obtain if the question could fairly be brought before the House. As the bill was engrossed for a third reading, no alteration could be made in it without a recommitment. He hoped therefore the motion would pass.

Mr. ELMER would not be opposed to a recommitment if thirty-five would suit the States generally better than thirty-three, and there was a prospect of carrying that number; but he believed that number would be injurious to the small States; he should therefore be opposed to the motion.

Mr. SOUTHARD thought, as the subject had been long before the House and under solemn consideration, there was no occasion for the postponement. By increasing the ratio, Rhode Island and some other of the small States would be deprived of a member. This had heretofore been viewed as a very important consideration, and he hoped it would be so viewed, and that the bill would not be recommitment.

Mr. DENNIS said, one reason assigned for recommitting was, in order to pass a law to make the return from South Carolina valid. He believed this would legalize that return as much as if fifty bills should be passed on the subject. He was not for being over-scrupulous on such occasions.

Mr. BAYARD hoped the bill would be recommitment to a Committee of the Whole. It was very discernable that the House yesterday was not disposed to hear arguments on the subject. He thought the efficacy of the law was at stake by a hasty determination. Irregularities have occurred in the returns in many instances, and it was improper to countenance such proceedings. In respect to South Carolina, the marshal had not taken an oath prior to his making the return, and yet gentlemen say it is valid, although the law requires an oath. If this is admitted, how can we expect that such requisitions will in future be attended to? If there be any solemnity in an oath, it is not to be so easily dispensed with, or hereafter there may be a general failure in complying with the laws respecting the census. By passing a law on the subject, that danger will be avoided. Without they proceeded in that way their laws would become mere waste paper, or dry leaves, that the winds would drive about in every direction.

There were perhaps but little hopes of success as he had brought forward the motion, yet he had been long enough in the House to know that they might vote one way to-day and differently to-morrow. Mr. B. was not confident that there might not be a change of opinion. Yesterday there was not sufficient calmness and sober judgment to hear arguments, but the House decided rather by the impulse of feeling. On the motion for recommitment he intended to call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. S. SMITH trusted that the House would not recommit the bill. They had with tranquillity listened yesterday to every word the gentleman from Delaware had to say on the occasion. They could not expect anything new on the subject. If anything new were possible he was persuaded the ingenuity of that gentleman would have brought it forward. It has been said the return from South Carolina is not according to law; but it should be remembered it was not the intention of the law to preclude any State from its proper number of representatives. There was a penalty upon the marshal if he did not comply with the law, but that was not to make the census ineffectual. He considered the return from New York a fair return, although it was not made within the time prescribed by law. The Marshal of South Carolina, though he did not take the oath before he made the return, yet in a few days he took an oath that it was faithfully made. The intention of the law was to give a fair ratio according to the returns, and any little informality did not invalidate them. He was surprised that a gentleman so correct as the gentleman from Delaware usually was, should charge the House with want of temper. Mr. S. had been long a member, and never saw the House preserve its temper better than it did yesterday; but he had on former occasions, when gentlemen of different political sentiments from the present majority possessed an ascendancy, seen a want of temper, such as the gentleman now without reason complained of.

Mr. GODDARD was unacquainted with the conduct of the House formerly. Yesterday he did think the conduct of the House was very strange when it was by some claimed to be the first republican representation under the new Constitution. Was there not a temper unbecoming the Legislature of a great nation? Did not it appear so when a gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON,) whose age and steady sober habits he revered, rose in his place, and declared that, sooner than agree to any postponement, he would sit there for forty-eight hours? He thought such a temper did not become those who were about to correct the line of conduct pursued for twelve years past.

Are gentlemen afraid to trust to themselves, that they oppose the recommitment of the bill? Were they afraid to have the question fully discussed? He never did agree to vote for thirty thousand as the ratio. The arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EUSTIS,) struck him as forcible, that a principle appeared to be formerly fixed, that the ratio of representation should increase with our population. Mr. G. thought the bill ought to be recommitment, as the return from Tennessee was not before them, and no legal return from another State. The census was the basis of legislation on this subject. He wished that ratio to be fixed that would be best adapted to the interest of the United States; nor was he afraid to trust himself or others on this subject, which did not appear to be the case with those opposed to a recommitment.

Mr. RUTLEDGE thought that calmness did not exist yesterday, that should always be observed by the House. If one gentleman were willing to stay, others were not. He had heard of a permanent session of a Legislature, and of great corruption that ensued; and he did not wish to see the experiment here. It frequently occurred yesterday, that when gentlemen rose to deliver their sentiments, there were repeated calls for the question, and therefore gentlemen would not force themselves upon the House.

The question should be fully debated; this had not been the case. He allowed it had been sufficiently debated whether it should be thirty or thirty-three thousand, but not in respect to a higher number. He was for thirty-five thousand, and hoped it would obtain, not by any new light that would be thrown on the subject; but as several persons yesterday expressed themselves in favor of a higher number, he believed many would vote for thirty-five. He did not see why they should have the doors closed upon them, and be thus prohibited from further debate with respect to higher numbers. His State felt a deep interest in the subject, and he should vote for a recommitment.

Mr. BACON said, a principal reason urged for a commitment was the unbecoming and unmanly conduct of the House yesterday, and he had been held up as eminent in the unworthy affair. The gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GODDARD) had discovered in him a disposition unbecoming his age and the sober habits of his native State.

He confessed he did think it strange yesterday, when some gentlemen assigned as a reason for postponing the bill, that the last return from Maryland had not been compared with the former return, when they were told it was on the Clerk's table, where they might satisfy themselves by comparing it with the former, which was also there. He saw it with his own eyes. He did suppose that something unfair must be intended by that objection being perseveringly urged, when every member could so easily satisfy himself.

Under these circumstances, he would submit it to the House, whether it was unbecoming his years, or the sober habits of his native State, to say that he would sit there till that time the next day, to hear any arguments the gentlemen could offer, that another day need not be lost on the subject.

Mr. T. MORRIS was in favor of the recommitment, not for the purpose of altering the ratio, which he considered as already fixed by the House, but for making the returns valid by law. Without doing this he believed they would establish a dangerous precedent.

Mr. SMILIE was not surprised to see the dissatisfaction that prevailed as to the decision made yesterday; it was the consequence of State interests and State attachments. He thought full time had been given for gentlemen to make up their minds upon different returns. The House, he contended, had a right to decide when the question should be put, and he thought it was then ripe for the question. The proceedings that morning were a mere trial of strength between the ratio of thirty and thirty-three thousand. Gentlemen want time, for what? To carry their point.

Mr. UPHAM believed the question had been decided, that a smaller number than thirty-three thousand should not be inserted. He wished the bill recommitted to try that point, yet he did not know that it would be in favor of New Hampshire to raise the ratio.

Mr. VAN NESS was more than ever convinced that local interest should not be attended to on this subject. He supposed that inflicting the penalty of the law on delinquent marshals would be the best mode of preventing future neglect. The temper of the House yesterday had been adverted to, and an expression made by a gentleman from Massachusetts had been spoken of with considerable animation. But was there not the same temper manifested by the minority? The gentleman from South Carolina had talked of permanent sessions, turning his eye, he supposed, across the Atlantic. He might have found them nearer home. Mr. VAN NESS had read of nocturnal sessions of that House, and also in the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. He did not, however, approve of nocturnal sessions.

Mr. DANA could not pretend to measure the minds of other gentlemen by his own, though some appeared to go on that plan. He could not wrap himself up in his own superlative intelligence and say that nothing new could be adduced; and he thought when such insinuations were thrown out, there was a want of that urbanity which should prevail in the House. He and his friends were charged with urging unnecessary delay; he felt no solicitude for any further discussion on the subject, but he did feel a solicitude as to the impropriety of their proceedings. Yesterday manifested, that public bodies are at times actuated by strong sympathy, and push forward with intemperate zeal, and an obstinacy unfavorable to fair discussion.

Mr. DANA then detailed the necessary formalities in the returns; if they were not complied with the business ought not to be rashly passed over. That the House were to examine and determine on the validity of returns, and the mode should be uniform. Some of the returns on their face are liable to suspicion. If they received those returns, would it not be waiving the penalty laid on marshals; or be sufficient to induce the President to enter a nolle prosequi?

Mr. RANDOLPH perceived this business was likely to go out to the people in a shape calculated to make them believe a majority of this House were disposed to suppress discussion, and act on illegitimate documents. It was proper to inquire whether that was the fact. The passage of that bill, as the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. DENNIS) justly observed, makes the informal returns valid. They were compelled to act upon those returns or not at all. Gentlemen complained they could not get at the question of raising the ratio; this is not the fact. If the House refuse to recommit, does it not show clearly it is opposed to raising the ratio? As to obstinacy, might not the charge be recriminated? Did not reiterated motions for the Committee to rise show as much obstinacy as when gentlemen say they would decide before they rose? There were instances of sittings being continued until nine or ten o'clock, formerly, to decide questions. A gentleman from Connecticut says this disposition comes into existence when there is the first republican House of Representatives. Mr. R. denied that this was the first republican House. He was of opinion that the republican interest went out of that House when the British Treaty came in. After the law for carrying that treaty into effect passed, the gentlemen now in the minority gained an ascendancy. He was unwilling to admit that to be the first republican House of Representatives.

Mr. GODDARD explained, and stated that he said, "which some claimed to be the first republican House;" but it was far from being his opinion; he believed all former Houses had been republican, and he hoped this would show itself to be so too.

Mr. DENNIS thought they must receive the returns as they were. He was not for the present ratio; yet he thought it was fairly taken; still he was in favor of going into the Committee of the Whole to bring the question for a higher ratio fairly before the House. The arguments about the formality of returns proved too much. According to them a new census should be taken in South Carolina. They should not be so rigid in that House as in a court of justice; they had every reason to suppose the returns were properly taken. If the bill should be recommitted he believed he would move for thirty-seven instead of thirty-three thousand; and if he could not get that, he would be for thirty-five thousand.

Mr. PERKINS considered the subject of importance as it respected the regularity of proceeding, which was certainly a matter of very great importance. He would not say the returns ought not to be admitted, but he would say they should only be admitted according to law. The law says they shall be made within a certain time; if they are not, a future law only can make them legal. Neither the Committee of the Whole nor the House could dispense with the law. Suppose it had been made the duty of the President to apportion the representation; would any gentleman in that case say he could receive any return of the census not made according to law? No; nor can this House. He wished a recommitment, to correct inaccuracies; and he believed it a great inaccuracy that this was not considered yesterday. He would have the penalties of the law inflicted upon the marshals, that a member need not in future have occasion, when the appointment was about to be made, to rise from his seat and call for an additional return.

Mr. NICHOLSON did not believe that passing over the informality of the returns in silence, as gentlemen call it, will exempt the marshals from the penalty, but he thought that passing a law to legalize the returns would screen them. Two reasons are assigned for going into Committee of the Whole again on this bill. One, to pass such laws; the other to scuffle again for the ratio, which he considered as fairly fixed yesterday. The great object of the gentleman from Delaware was to scuffle again for the ratio; by persevering he hoped to succeed: perseverance was very commendable, but he hoped that gentlemen would pardon the majority if they also persevered.

Mr. S. SMITH.—It has been observed on the proceedings of yesterday, that a fair, open discussion did not take place. He confessed an obstinacy was discovered. He had been the greater part of his life in minorities, and he never saw a minority discover so much obstinacy as yesterday. The observation of the gentleman from Massachusetts was not a relinquishment of his steady habits, but an evidence of them; and he believed that declaration obtained the vote. Calculation was a fair ground of decision on this subject, and it became some gentlemen to examine whether, in wishing to take a higher ratio, they were not actuated by a spirit of envy towards Rhode Island, that because she had lately taken a more proper bent in politics they wished to deprive her of one member. A higher ratio would also deprive republican Maryland of one member, and give a greater proportional weight over her to another State not republican.

Mr. GRISWOLD wondered much to hear on that floor such distinctions, that one State was republican and another was not; he thought they had it from very high authority, and such as that gentleman, he supposed, would greatly respect, that we were all republican, all federal.

Mr. G. believed there were many reasons for recommitting the bill. First, that a critical examination of the returns might be made. The law prescribed certain modes which, in many instances, the returning officers have deviated from. In the return from Tennessee, which he had before him, but which had never been printed for the use of the House, and which very few members had ever seen, in that return there was no certificate that the marshal had taken any oath. He did not say there had been no oath on that occasion; but there was no evidence of it before that House. He did not think it was a correct mode of doing business to admit such informalities without any investigation.

He also wished the bill recommitment for the purpose of re-examining the ratio. He was originally for 40,000, and would still be for that number, as he believed the ratio should progress with the population of the country. In the nature of things we must advance the ratio at some period or other, and when shall we begin it if not now?

Mr. SOUTHARD spoke against recommitment. He thought it a dangerous and disorganizing attempt. They must act upon the evidence they had of the census, or not at all. Some gentlemen were in favor of raising the ratio, after it had been solemnly argued, and so much had been said in favor of a large representation. Did they wish now to retrace their steps after the subject had been decided, and enlarge the ratio, to the great injury of some of the small States?

Mr. DENNIS said, in these enlightened days of new-born republicanism, he did not expect to hear gentlemen charged with a desire to punish the citizens of Rhode Island and Maryland because those States had undergone a political regeneration. He could not imagine how his colleague (Mr. SMITH) could attribute such unworthy motives to him.

He had formerly stated why he varied his vote from 33 to 30; his great object was to strengthen the General Government, not, as some reporters had represented, to give that House greater weight than the Senate, for he had always believed that in a conflict between the different branches, that House would bring the Senate and President prostrate at its feet. His object in enlarging the representation was to enable its members to counteract the misrepresentations which have been industriously spread through the country, and which are calculated to destroy that Government, and erect the State government on its ruins. He was now inclined to meet the objection as to inconvenience in having a great number in that House. By raising the ratio to 37,000, it would give that House, he believed, about 120 members. The interest of Maryland was in favor of strengthening the Federal Government rather than increasing its own relative weight.

Mr. T. MORRIS gave an account of the manner in which the returns from New York and Maryland had been made. If the Marshal of the latter possessed one-tenth of the zeal that the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) had, he might unintentionally make a mistake in his last return. Since that return, the gentleman from Maryland had argued the bill with a precipitancy that party calculations only could impel. He wished to be convinced that the first return was inaccurate. The addition of one member to any State was of importance to the Union.

Mr. EUSTIS was against recommitting the bill. Yesterday he voted for the Committee to rise, but was now satisfied as to the returns from Maryland and South Carolina. Substance he thought should never be sacrificed to form. The principle he started upon was 33, and he still adhered to that. He thought it incorrect to say the powers of the House would be increased by increasing its members; vary the number as you please, the Constitutional powers remain the same. If the House decide against going into Committee, it is as much as saying they are satisfied with 33,000, the ratio fixed in the bill. He had no idea of crowding or bearing down the minority by the majority, nor did he think there was any ground for making such a charge. Gentlemen have a full opportunity now on the question of going into Committee to offer their arguments in favor of increasing the ratio, and he had no doubt they would be patiently heard.

Mr. BAYARD observed, that from the explanations made about ill-humor yesterday, it was possible he and his friends might mistake. Gentlemen say they were patient and willing to hear discussion. There had been imputations made by gentlemen yesterday and that day, that the motives by which the minority were influenced were neither fair nor honorable. Was that candid? When complaints were made of the conduct of the House yesterday, it was replied that the House were formerly guilty of similar impropriety. He would not defend the conduct of any former Congress; if it was wrong then, it would be equally wrong now. It would be more laudable to vary from it than to imitate it.

Mr. B. said there were many grounds upon which a recommitment could be urged. In point of fact the census was not such as to enable them to act. Mr. B. then gave a history of the returns, &c.

An honorable gentleman had said we should not sacrifice form to substance, but where, he asked, could the line be drawn? It might at length be urged, that the oath was entirely a matter of form, and therefore to be wholly dispensed with. One State might expect a cargo of United Irishmen, and another a cargo of a different description, to swell their population; they would, therefore, defer their return, disregarding anything and everything the law prescribed, as mere matter of form. Unless attention is paid to the forms prescribed, the nation is exposed to perpetual fraud. A return was not true or legal if not made within the time limited. Gentlemen say, pass this bill, and then make a law to legalize the returns; this, he said, to use a vulgar adage, would be putting the cart before the horse. As to inflicting a penalty upon the marshals, it could not be done if that House say the returns are legal.

Mr. B. said he did not expect to hear from a gentleman so urbane and well-bred as the one from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) arguments founded on the supposition of one State being republican and another not so. He hardly knew how to excuse the gentleman when he said the minority are not republicans. If he did mean to apply such an epithet to them, Mr. B. said he would oppose a flat denial to his assertion; he knew not what pretensions there could be for saying so. Can it be alleged that we ever urged anything that was anti-republican? The gentleman must have forgot himself. He surely thought he was addressing a mob on some electioneering occasion. I may have mistaken the gentleman; there are many kinds of republicans. Bonaparte called himself a republican, although he was more absolute than Louis XIV, ruling the nation with a rod of iron. Bonaparte called himself a republican, to get the station he now holds. If, with a certain high authority, the gentleman does believe "we are all federalists and all republicans," he should define what species of republicanism he meant when he made use of the term. [Mr. B. was called to order here and in one or two other parts of his speech, but the Speaker declared him to be in order.]

Mr. B. proceeded, and observed he was about to say we (the minority) are not such republicans as Monsieur Bonaparte or Robespierre; we do not wish to make a general prostration of every civil institution, and of all respect for morals and religion.

As to this being the first republican House of Representatives, or republicanism going out when the British Treaty came in, he believed no such opinion was ever entertained until the country was infected with French principles. Then one party was called British and the other French. He did not know that we had suffered from that treaty, but we owed our war with France to it. It had been reiterated that there was an anti-republican party in that House. He was sorry to see the House divided by such artificial distinctions. He wished all would co-operate in dispelling such imputations, and allow that all are equally interested in promoting the welfare of our common country. He was sorry to hear that these explanations as regarded parties are matters of form, and as the gentleman from Massachusetts says these are of no importance, he hoped they would be discarded.

As to there being pertinacity or obstinacy in the minority in making motion after motion yesterday, he wanted no precedent for his justification; he was satisfied with himself, and would proceed in that line of conduct which he felt to be his duty. Must gentlemen be told they are guilty of obstinacy because they do not bow the neck or humble themselves in the dust to every measure of the majority? Or must they bear the charge of not being actuated by proper motives if they venture to differ from the majority? He hoped no one would be intimidated by such unjust imputations.

Mr. RUTLEDGE expressed his opinion in favor of the propriety of answering the imputations which had been made; but he hoped the business would cease there, and that they should not proceed with recrimination, which was calculated to do injury abroad.

Mr. S. SMITH replied to Mr. BAYARD. He was pleased that Mr. B. allowed he had behaved with politeness to gentlemen and avoided personalities. When he spoke of temper, it was not his own,

JANUARY, 1802.

Apportionment Bill.

H. OF R.

but that of the House, he praised. If he had attempted an eulogium on the mildness of his own temper it would have been very ill-judged; he believed few would have given credit to it. The gentleman from Delaware complains of party distinctions being made in this House; but he started the subject himself yesterday. A gentleman from New York, in the course of debate, had observed that it had been made a question in the State of Delaware whether sovereignty was of any real advantage, and whether they would not be in a better situation by being united to another State. The gentleman from Delaware rose in his place and said it was true such a question was agitated, but by whom? By a set of persons originally called jacobins, then democrats, and now republicans. What was their object? They had been long struggling to get the offices of that State into their hands, but failing in their attempt, they wished to throw themselves into the State of Pennsylvania. Mr. S. said the gentleman to be sure had a right thus to abuse his own constituents, and he had nothing to do with it; he could not at the time help regretting that the gentleman had not a colleague to answer him. If he had been his colleague he would have answered him in this way: Who opposed giving up the sovereignty of the State of Delaware? A set of men formerly called old torjes, next aristocrats, then monarchists, and now federalists. The gentleman from Delaware might in his way be a republican, and so might Bonaparte in his way. Mr. S. did not think we are all federalists and all republicans, though he believed the great mass of the people of the United States were so. He believed some leading characters in the country were led away by the intrigues and influence of Britain; while they could make a handle of French malconduct and French depredations, the people were led away by these characters; but when the days of delusion were over, the people returned to their sober senses. He had been forced into the observations he made relating to party.

Mr. BAYARD thought the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) had betrayed sensibilities not justified by anything which had occurred. The gentleman must certainly have taken to himself what was designed for others, for he had not observed any personal remark which had been directed to his feelings. On the contrary he had thought the gentleman was treated with great decorum. But, said Mr. B., be the case as it will, the gentleman is not excusable for making a charge against me neither correct nor candid. He has stated that I have abused my constituents; there is not the smallest ground for such a statement. Mr. B. said he was incapable of abusing his constituents, or suffering them to be abused by others. He would take the liberty of examining the grounds of the gentleman's charge.

In the debate of a former day it had been insinuated that he was inimical to the State governments, and it was stated upon the occasion that an attempt had been made to abolish the sovereignty of his State, and to unite the territory with other States. There could have been no intention in stating the fact, but to support the insinuation of his hostility to the State governments. It therefore became him to disclose the whole truth, that the attempt referred to had been made, but that it was made by the party to which he was opposed, and repelled by the party to which he was attached.

The parties could not be discriminated without naming them, and as his opponents had been distinguished by several names, he had a right to suppose he should give the least offence by using them all, and allowing them to make their selection. The gentleman had said he had abused his constituents. Sir, said Mr. B., I believe there were very few of my constituents who co-operated in the project of pulling down the State government, for the purpose of submitting themselves to the yoke of the democracy of Pennsylvania. The gentleman might be assured that they who had sent him here were disposed to pull down no government.

But he would ask, where was the use in describing people by the names they had assumed themselves? Was it abusing the party to call them democrats? There had been a democratic society formed in our first city, and some men now high in office had become members of it. They were then not ashamed, but proud of the appellation of democrat. The name might not be deemed as honorable as formerly, but he had not been sensible before that it was considered as a term of abuse.

The gentleman had said a great deal about British influence. He does not believe that we are infected with it, or the people in general, but he believes there are leading characters in the country led away by the intrigues and influence of Britain. Sir, said Mr. B., I am ignorant of the sources of that gentleman's information; but if the gentleman ventures his assertion upon the ground of public news—upon the ground of what has been circulated in the newspapers and credited by certain people—give me leave to tell him that there is the same foundation to assert that some leading men in the country have been led away by French influence and French intrigues. He believed that France had employed more agents in the country than Britain, who had held out more allurements, and employed greater and more successful means to seduce the integrity of our citizens than British agents—at least such things had been said and believed by as many people as those who entertained the opinion expressed by the gentleman. For his own part he could hope that neither belief had any other foundation than the noise and clamor of party. He deprecated the consequences of distinction drawn from supposed connexions with foreign nations. If there must be party, let us divide as Americans, and not as French and English. The very distinction tends to embitter the spirit of party and weaken the attachment to our country. He was sorry that upon the floor of that House gentlemen should employ themselves in blowing the flame of civil discord. It would be a worthier office to harmonize and to remove the errors of public opinion, which we know to be groundless, and which divide the country. He did not know that he had heretofore transgressed the doctrine he had inculcated, but if he had he would endeavor in future to practise it.

About half after 3 o'clock an adjournment was called for, but not agreed to.

Mr. ELMER advocated an immediate decision of the question; nor did he think that could be justly called obstinacy, as all the information wanted on the subject was before the House. He expressed his regret for the personal allusions that had been made.

Mr. GODDARD said he would consider it one of the most unfortunate incidents of his life if what he had said had necessarily given rise to the party allusions that had been made. He thought the House must have had a strong predisposition to the disease with which it had been that day infected if it had been excited by his observations.

Mr. G. was convinced that prejudices and passions crept imperceptibly upon the public mind. He had examined himself as to the charge made by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) and would repeat what he had before observed, that he was willing to deprive his own State of a Representative to benefit the Union. If the gentleman has not patriotism himself to act in that manner, he trusted it would be allowed a human mind might be actuated by such motives. As to being influenced by envy towards Rhode Island on account of its political regeneration, he assured the gentleman envy was the last passion that would rankle in his mind.

The question for recommitment was taken by yeas and nays. Yeas 34, nays 56, as follows:

THURSDAY, January 7.

A memorial of Evan Thomas and others, a committee appointed for Indian affairs by the yearly meeting of the people called Friends, held in the town of Baltimore, was presented to the House and read, praying the attention and interference of Congress to prevent the supply of spirituous liquors to the Indian tribes residing in the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, by traders and settlers on the frontiers, and to introduce among the said Indian tribes the most simple and useful arts of civil life.—Referred to Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. GRISWOLD, Mr. DAVIS, Mr. HOGUE, and Mr. RANDOLPH, to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

A memorial of Isaac Zane was presented to the House and read, praying that he may be permitted to retain the possession of a certain tract of land which was granted to him by the Wyandot nation of Indians, and which, by the cession of lands since made by the said nation, falls within the boundary of the United States.—Referred to Mr. JACKSON, Mr. FEARING, Mr. VAN HORNE, Mr. ELMER, and Mr. JOSIAH SMITH; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

A memorial of sundry delegates chosen by, and in behalf of, a number of aliens residing in the county of Chester, in the State of Pennsylvania, was presented to the House and read, praying a repeal or amendment of an act of Congress, passed on the eighteenth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, entitled "An act supplementary to, and to amend the act, entitled 'An act to establish an uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the act heretofore passed on that subject.'—Referred to the committee appointed, on the fifteenth ultimo, to prepare and bring in a bill or bills for a revision and amendment of the laws respecting naturalization.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, enclosing a table showing the comparative duties paid in the ports of Great Britain on goods imported into Great Britain, in American, foreign, and British bottoms, since the 5th of January, 1798, so far as the same respects the commerce of the United States, made in pursuance of a resolution of this House of the 24th ultimo; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from William Doughty, principal clerk in the office of the Treasurer of the United States, accompanying an account of Samuel Meredith, the late Treasurer, of receipts and expenditures of public moneys, from the first of July to the thirteenth of September, one thousand eight hundred and one; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a statement exhibiting the amount of duties and drawbacks on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and exported therefrom, during the years one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, and one thousand eight hundred, in pursuance of a standing order of the House of the third of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the second and third resolutions reported, on the twenty-second ultimo, from the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union; and the same being severally twice read were agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient to inquire whether any, and if any, what, addition it may be necessary to make to the military stores of the United States.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report whether any, and, if any, what, amendments are necessary in the laws respecting the fortifications of the harbors of the United States.

Ordered, That Mr. GREGG, Mr. L. R. MORRIS, Mr. LOWNDES, Mr. NEWTON, and Mr. CUTTS, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the first resolution.

Ordered, That Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. DAVIS, Mr. WALKER, Mr. JOHN TALIAFERRO, Jr., and Mr. JONES, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the second resolution.

Mr. S. SMITH reported a bill for the protection of American commerce and seamen in the Mediterranean and adjoining seas, which empowers the President fully to equip and employ such vessels of the United States as he shall deem requisite; that they be empowered to capture Tripolitan vessels; and that the President be authorized to commission private vessels, with power to capture vessels of Tripoli.

Read twice, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NICHOLSON presented a letter which he had received from the Governor of Maryland, enclosing a letter from the Commissioners of the City of Washington, addressed to the Legislature of that State, stating their present inability to defray the interest accruing on loans of about $250,000, made by Maryland, and suggesting the expediency of that Legislature offering to receive from Congress, who had guaranteed the loans, six per cent. stock at par; the loans having been originally made in six per cents., with an engagement that repayment should be made in specie. Also, resolutions of the Legislature of Maryland, agreeing to the proposition of the Commissioners.—Referred to the Secretary of the Treasury.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the standing rules of the House.

Mr. LEIB moved the addition of the following rule:

"The Speaker shall assign such places to the stenographers on the floor as shall not interfere with the convenience of the House."

Mr. LEIB prefaced his motion, by observing that, in the standing rules proposed, no provision appeared to be made for the admission of stenographers. They had heretofore been subject to the will of the Speaker. However great his respect for the present Speaker, he was of opinion, that they should not depend for their accommodation upon the will of any man; and he thought it became the House, on this occasion, to establish a precedent which would place those who took the debates above the caprice of any individual.

Mr. HUGER moved to amend the motion so as to read as follows:

"Stenographers shall be admitted, and the Speaker shall assign such places to them on the floor as shall not interfere with the convenience of the House."

Mr. LEIB agreed to this modification.

The motion was opposed by Mr. GRISWOLD, Mr. RUTLEDGE, Mr. VARNUM, Mr. HEMPHILL, Mr. T. MORRIS, Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. DANA, Mr. ELMER, and Mr. GODDARD; and supported by Mr. LEIB, Mr. S. SMITH, Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. CLAIBORNE, Mr. SMILIE, Mr. HOLLAND, and Mr. SPRIGG.

Mr. HUGER opposed the original motion of Mr. LEIB, but supported the motion, as amended by himself.

The opponents of the motion declared, that it did not relate to substance, but merely to form; that it was allowed on all hands, that the debates should be taken, and that stenographers should, consequently, be admitted. But the single question was, how, and under what authority, they should be admitted. They remarked, that they had heretofore been admitted by the Speaker, under whose direction they had remained; that the Speaker was the only proper authority under whose direction they ought still to remain; that, as the preservation of order and decorum rested with him, the stenographers, as well as other persons, should be permitted by him to enter the House, and be by him excluded, whenever, in his opinion, the order and a respect for the House required it. That, in case stenographers deputed themselves in a disrespectful manner, or grossly misrepresented the ideas of members, the Speaker was the only person who could effectually cure the evil; that there had been, and might again be, instances of such misconduct; that, in one case, a stenographer had entered the House in a state of intoxication; another case, a speech of a gentleman, from South Carolina, had been perversely misrepresented, and the stenographer had refused to correct his errors, for which he had been expelled the House; and that, in another case, the Speaker, considering himself as misrepresented, had expelled the stenographer.

Among the opponents of the motion, a great diversity of opinion prevailed. Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. VARNUM, and Mr. ELMER, objected to it, merely on the ground that it was improper to come to any solemn decision, which was the less necessary, as the stenographers already occupied convenient seats, from which there was no probability of their being extruded by the Speaker.

Those who supported the motion, considered its decision as involving an important point; a point no less important than, whether the debates of that House should be taken with accuracy, and published without fear or partiality. They averred it as a fact, that, owing to the unwarrantable conduct of the Speaker, this had heretofore, at many periods, not been the case. The public had sought information without being able to get it. It was true, that a stenographer had been expelled for publishing a speech of a gentleman from South Carolina; but it was not for misrepresenting that speech, but for faithfully publishing it; and in the other case alluded to, a stenographer had been expelled by the Speaker, for stating, with correctness, what the Speaker had himself said. These were alarming facts, not to be forgotten, and which claimed the interposition of the House. If stenographers should be guilty of indecorum, they could still, this rule notwithstanding, be expelled the House. It was acknowledged that the gentleman who at present filled the Chair, was entitled to the full confidence of the House, but it was dangerous to vest arbitrary power in the hands of any man, and it was peculiarly proper to provide in fair, for foul weather; and it was added, that though the proposed rule would not be obligatory upon a future House, yet it would form a precedent, which they might see fit to respect.

The motion, as modified by Mr. HUGER, was then agreed to—yeas 47, nays 32.

The Committee then rose, and reported the rules with the above amendment.

The amendment was immediately taken up; when,

Mr. RUTLEDGE moved to amend the report of the Committee, by making it read as follows:

“Stenographers may be admitted under the direction of the Speaker, who shall assign to them such places on the floor as shall not interfere with the convenience of the House.”

On this amendment a further debate ensued; after which, the yeas and nays were called, and were—yeas 27, nays 51, as follows:

YEAS—John Campbell, Samuel W. Dana, Franklin Davenport, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, William Barry Grove, William H. Hill, Benjamin Huger, Ebenezer Mattoon, Lewis R. Thompson, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Philip Van Cortlandt, Joseph B. Varnum, and Isaac Van Horne.

Another motion was then made and seconded to amend the said amendment, by inserting after the words, “stenographers shall,” the following words “until otherwise ordered by the House:”

And, the question being thereupon taken, it passed in the negative.

And the main question being put, that the House do agree to the amendment for an additional rule, as reported from the Committee of the whole House, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 47, nays 28, as follows:

Standing Rules and Orders.

H. OF R.

linghaast, Peleg Wadsworth, Benjamin Walker, and Lemuel Williams.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said standing rules and orders, amended to read as followeth :

Rules and orders for conducting business of the House of Representatives of the United States.

First—Touching the duty of the Speaker.

He shall take the Chair every day at the hour to which the House shall have adjourned on the preceding day ; shall immediately call the members to order ; and, on the appearance of a quorum, shall cause the Journal of the preceding day to be read.

He shall preserve decorum and order ; may speak to points of order, in preference to other members, rising from his seat for that purpose, and shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal to the House by any two members.

He shall rise to put a question, but may state it sitting.

Questions shall be distinctly put in this form, to wit : "As many as are of opinion that (as the case may be) say Ay ;" and, after the affirmative voice is expressed, "As many as are of a contrary opinion, say No." If the Speaker doubts, or a division be called for, the House shall divide ; those in the affirmative of the question shall first rise from their seats, and afterwards those in the negative. If the Speaker still doubts, or a count be required, the Speaker shall name two members, one from each side, to tell the numbers in the affirmative ; which being reported, he shall then name two others, one from each side, to tell those in the negative ; which being also reported, he shall rise, and state the decision to the House.

All committees shall be appointed by the Speaker, unless otherwise specially directed by the House, in which case they shall be appointed by ballot ; and if, upon such ballot, the number required shall not be elected by a majority of the votes given, the House shall proceed to a second ballot, in which a plurality of votes shall prevail ; and in case a greater number than are required to compose or complete the committee shall have an equal number of votes, the House shall proceed to a further ballot or ballots.

In all cases of ballot by the House, the Speaker shall vote ; in other cases he shall not vote, unless the House be equally divided, or unless his vote, if given to the majority, will make the division equal ; and, in case of such equal division, the question shall be lost.

All acts, addresses, and joint resolutions, shall be signed by the Speaker ; and all writs, warrants, or subpoenas, issued by order of the House, shall be under his hand and seal, attested by the Clerk.

In case of any disturbance or disorderly conduct in the gallery or lobby, the Speaker (or Chairman of the Committee of the whole House) shall have power to order the same to be cleared.

Stenographers shall be admitted ; and the Speaker shall assign such places to them on the floor, as shall not interfere with the convenience of the House.

Secondly—Of Decorum and Debate.

When any member is about to speak in debate, or deliver any matter to the House, he shall rise from his seat, and respectfully address himself to Mr. Speaker.

If any member, in speaking, or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order ; in which case, the member so called to order shall immediately sit down, unless permitted to explain, and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case, but without debate. If there be no appeal, the decision of the Chair shall be submitted to. If the decision be in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed ; if otherwise, and the case require it, he shall be liable to the censure of the House.

When two or more members happen to rise at once, the Speaker shall name the member who is first to speak.

No member shall speak more than twice to the same question, without leave of the House, nor more than once, until every member, choosing to speak, shall have spoken.

Whilst the Speaker is putting any question, or addressing the House, none shall walk out of, or across, the House ; nor, in such case, or when a member is speaking, shall entertain private discourse, nor, whilst a member is speaking, shall pass between him and the Chair.

No member shall vote on any question, in the event of which he is immediately and particularly interested ; or in any other case, where he was present when the question was put.

Upon a division and count of the House on any question, no member without the bar shall be counted.

Every member who shall be in the House when a question is put shall give his vote, unless the House, for special reasons, shall excuse him.

When a motion is made and seconded, it shall be stated by the Speaker, or, being in writing, it shall be handed to the Chair, and read aloud by the Clerk, before debated.

Every motion shall be reduced to writing, if the Speaker or any member desire it.

After a motion is stated by the Speaker, or read by the Clerk, it shall be deemed to be in the possession of the House, but may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment.

When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received, unless to amend it, to commit it for the previous question, to postpone it to a day certain, or to adjourn.

A motion to adjourn shall be always in order, and shall be decided without debate.

The previous question shall be in this form, "Shall the main question be now put ?" It shall only be admitted when demanded by five members ; and, until it is decided, shall preclude all amendment and further debate of the main question.

On a previous question, no member shall speak more than once without leave.

Any member may call for the division of a question, where the sense will admit of it.

A motion for commitment, until it is decided, shall preclude all amendment of the main question.

Motions and reports may be committed at the pleasure of the House.

No new motion or proposition shall be admitted, under color of amendment, as a substitute for the motion or proposition under debate.

When a question has been once made and carried, in the affirmative, or negative, it shall be in order for any member of the majority to move for the reconsideration thereof.

When the reading of a paper is called for, and the same objected to by any member, it shall be determined by a vote of the House.

The unfinished business, in which the House was engaged at the time of the last adjournment, shall have the preference in the orders of the day; and no motion on any other business shall be received, without special leave of the House, until the former is disposed of.

In all other cases of ballot, than for committees, a majority of the votes given shall be necessary to an election; and when there shall not be such majority on the first ballot, the ballot shall be repeated until a majority be obtained.

In all cases, when others than members of the House may be eligible, there shall be a previous nomination.

If a question depending be lost by adjournment of the House, and revived on the succeeding day, no member, who has spoken twice on the day preceding, shall be permitted again to speak without leave.

Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate shall be necessary, shall be read to the House, and laid on the table, on a day preceding that in which the same shall be moved, unless the House shall otherwise expressly allow.

Petitions, memorials, and other papers, addressed to the House, shall be presented by the Speaker, or by a member in his place; a brief statement of the contents thereof shall verbally be made by the introducer, and shall not be debated or decided on the day of their being first read, unless where the House shall direct otherwise; but shall lie on the table, to be taken up in the order they were read.

Any fifteen members (including the Speaker, if there is one) shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members.

Upon calls of the House, or in taking the yeas and nays on any question, the names of the members shall be called alphabetically.

Any member may excuse himself from serving on any committee, at the time of his appointment, if he is then a member of two other committees.

No member shall absent himself from the service of the House, unless he have leave, or be sick and unable to attend.

Upon a call of the House, the names of the members shall be called over by the Clerk, and the absentees noted; after which the names of the absentees shall be again called over: the doors shall then be shut, and those for whom no excuse, or insufficient excuses are made, may, by order of the House, be taken into custody, as they appear, or may be sent for and taken into custody, wherever to be found, by special messengers to be appointed for that purpose.

When a member shall be discharged from custody, and admitted to his seat, the House shall determine whether such discharge shall be with, or without paying fees; and, in like manner, whether a delinquent member, taken into custody by a special messenger, shall, or shall not, be liable to defray the expense of said special messenger.

A Sergeant-at-Arms shall be appointed, to hold his office during the pleasure of the House, whose duty it shall be to attend the House during its sitting; to execute the commands of the House, from time to time; together with all such process, issued by authority thereof, as shall be directed to him by the Speaker.

The fees of the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be: for every arrest, the sum of two dollars; for each day's custody and release, one dollar; and for travelling expenses of himself, or a special messenger, going and returning, one-tenth of a dollar per mile.

Five standing committees shall be appointed at the commencement of each session, viz:

A Committee of Elections, to consist of seven members;

A Committee of Claims, to consist of seven members;

A Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to consist of seven members;

A Committee of Ways and Means, to consist of seven members;

And a Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business, to consist of three members.

It shall be the duty of the said Committee of Elections to examine and report upon the certificates of election, or other credentials, of the members returned to serve in this House, and to take into their consideration all such petitions, and other matters touching elections and returns, as shall or may be presented, or come in question, and be referred to them by the House.

It shall be the duty of the said Committee of Claims to take into consideration all such petitions, and matters or things touching claims and demands on the United States, as shall be presented, or shall or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House; and to report their opinion thereupon, together with such propositions for relief therein, as to them shall seem expedient.

It shall be the duty of the said Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to take into consideration all such petitions, and matters or things touching the commerce and manufactures of the United States, as shall be presented, or shall or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House; and to report, from time to time, their opinion thereon.

It shall be the duty of the said Committee of Ways and Means to take into consideration all such reports of the Treasury Department, and all such propositions relative to the revenue, as may be referred to them by the House; to inquire into the state of the public debt, of the revenue, and of the expenditures, and to report, from time to time, their opinion thereon; to examine into the state of the several public departments, and particularly into the laws making appropriations of moneys, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws; and, also, to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements, as may be necessary to add to the economy of the departments, and the accountability of their officers.

It shall be the duty of the said Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business to examine and report what laws have expired, or are near expiring, and require to be revived or further continued; also, to examine and report, from the Journal of the last session, all such matters as were then depending and undetermined.

No committee shall sit during the sitting of the House without special leave.

The Clerk of the House shall take an oath for the true and faithful discharge of the duties of his office, to the best of his knowledge and abilities; and shall be deemed to continue in office until another be appointed.

It shall be the duty of the Clerk of the House, at the end of each session, to send a printed copy of the Journal thereof to the Executive, and to each branch of the Legislature, of every State.

Whenever confidential communications are received from the President of the United States, the House shall be cleared of all persons, except the members and the Clerk, and so continue during the reading of such communications, and (unless otherwise directed by the House) during all debates and proceedings to be had thereon. And when the Speaker, or any other member, shall inform the House that he has communications to make, which he conceives ought to be kept secret, the House shall, in like manner, be cleared till the communication be made: the House shall then determine whether the matter communicated requires secrecy or not, and take order accordingly.

Thirdly.—Of Bills.

Every bill shall be introduced by motion for leave, or by an order of the House on the report of a committee, and, in either case, a committee to prepare the same shall be appointed. In cases of a general nature, one day's notice, at least, shall be given of the motion to bring in a bill; and every such motion may be committed.

Every bill shall receive three several readings in the House, previous to its passage; and all bills shall be despatched in order as they were introduced, unless where the House shall direct otherwise; but no bill shall be twice read on the same day, without special order of the House.

The first reading of the bill shall be for information, and if opposition be made to it the question shall be, "Shall the bill be rejected?" If no opposition be made, or if the question to reject be negatived, the bill shall go to its second reading without a question.

Upon the second reading of the bill, the Speaker shall state it as ready for commitment or engrossment; and if committed, then a question shall be, whether to a select or standing committee, or to a Committee of the whole House; if to a committee of the whole House, the House shall determine on what day. But if the bill be ordered to be engrossed, the House shall appoint the day when it shall be read the third time.

After commitment and report thereof to the House, a bill may be recommitted, or at any time before its passage.

All bills ordered to be engrossed, shall be executed in a fair round hand.

When a bill shall pass, it shall be certified by the Clerk, noting the day of its passing at the foot thereof.

Fourthly.—Of Committees of the Whole House.

It shall be a standing order of the day, throughout the session, for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

In forming a Committee of the whole House, the Speaker shall leave his chair, and a Chairman to preside in committee shall be appointed by the Speaker.

Upon bills committed to a Committee of the whole House, the bill shall be first read throughout by the Clerk, and then again read and debated by clauses, leaving the preamble to be last considered; the body of the bill shall not be defaced or interlined; but all amendments, noting the page and line, shall be duly entered by the Clerk on a separate paper, as the same shall be agreed to by the committee, and so reported to the House. After report, the bill shall again be subject to be debated and amended by clauses, before a question to engross it be taken.

All amendments made to an original motion in committee shall be incorporated with the motion, and so reported.

All amendments made to a report committed to a Committee of the whole House shall be noted and reported as in the case of bills.

All questions, whether in committee, or in the House, shall be propounded in the order in which they were moved, except that, in filling up blanks, the largest sum and the longest time shall be first put.

No motion or proposition for a tax, or charge upon the people, shall be discussed the day in which it is made or offered, and every such proposition shall receive its first discussion in a Committee of the whole House.

No sum or quantum of tax or duty, voted by a Committee of the whole House, shall be increased in the House, until the motion or proposition for such increase shall be first discussed and voted in a Committee of the whole House; and so in respect to the time of its continuance.

All proceedings, touching appropriations of money, shall be first moved and discussed in a Committee of the whole House.

The rules of proceedings in the House shall be observed in committee, so far as they may be applicable, except the rule limiting the times of speaking.

That no person shall be admitted within the lobby, but members of the Senate, officers of the General or State Governments, foreign Ministers, and such as are introduced by the members of the House.

No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded without one day's notice being given of the motion therefor.

Joint rules and Orders of the Two Houses.

In every case of an amendment of a bill agreed to in one House, and dissented to in the other, if either House shall request a conference, and appoint a committee for that purpose, and the other House shall also appoint a committee to confer, such committees shall, at a convenient hour, to be agreed on by their Chairman, meet in the conference chamber, and state to each other verbally or in writing, as either shall chose, the reason of their respective Houses for and against the amendment, and confer freely thereon.

When a message shall be sent from the Senate to the House of Representatives, it shall be announced at the door of the House, by the Doorkeeper, and shall be respectfully communicated to the Chair, by the person by whom it may be sent.

The same ceremony shall be observed, when a message shall be sent from the House of Representatives to the Senate.

Messages shall be sent by such persons, as a sense of propriety, in each House, may determine to be proper.

While bills are on their passage between the two Houses, they shall be on paper, and under the signature of the Secretary or Clerk of each House respectively.

After a bill shall have passed both Houses, it shall be duly enrolled on parchment, by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, or the Secretary of the Senate, as the bill may have originated in the one or the other House, before it shall be presented to the President of the United States.

When bills are enrolled, they shall be examined by a joint committee of one from the Senate, and two from the House of Representatives, appointed as a standing committee for that purpose, who shall carefully compare the enrolment with the engrossed bills, as passed in the two Houses, and, correcting any errors that may be discovered in the enrolled bills, make their report, forthwith, to the respective Houses.

After examination and report, each bill shall be signed in the respective Houses, first by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and then by the President of the Senate.

After a bill shall have thus been signed in each House, it shall be presented by the said committee to the President of the United States, for his approbation, it being first endorsed on the back of the roll, certifying in which

House the same originated; which endorsement shall be signed by the Secretary or Clerk (as the case may be) of the House in which the same did originate, and shall be entered on the journal of each House. The said committee shall report the day of presentation to the President, which time shall also be carefully entered on the journal of each House.

All orders, resolutions, and votes, which are to be presented to the President of the United States, for his approbation, shall also, in the same manner, be previously enrolled, examined, and signed, and shall be presented in the same manner, and by the same committee, as provided in case of bills.

When the Senate and House of Representatives shall judge it proper to make a joint address to the President, it shall be presented to him in his audience chamber, by the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Speaker and both Houses.

FRIDAY, January 8.

Mr. MILLEDGE, from the Committee of Elections, reported that the committee had examined the certificates and other credentials of the members returned to serve in this House; and had agreed to a further report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report whether any, and what, alterations are necessary to be made in the "Act respecting quarantine and health laws."

Ordered, That Mr. MITCHILL, Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. LEIB, Mr. ARCHER, and Mr. LOWNDES, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to cause to be laid before this House an estimate of the expenses which are necessary for the carrying into effect the Convention between the United States of America and the French Republic.

Ordered, That Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. BAYARD be appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House such information and documents as are in possession of the Department of State, relative to spoliations committed on the commerce of the United States, under Spanish authority; and, also, relative to the imprisonment of the American Consul at Saint Jago de Cuba.

Ordered, That Mr. BAYARD and Mr. RANDOLPH be appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee appointed, on the fourteenth ultimo, "to inquire into the expediency or in expediency of giving further time to persons entitled to military land warrants to obtain and locate the same; and, also, to report what provision ought to be made by law to authorize the Secretary of War to issue military land warrants, and duplicates of the same, where satisfactory proof is made that the originals have been lost, destroyed, or obtained by fraud;" which lay on the table: Whereupon,

Ordered, That the farther consideration of the said report be postponed until Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the fourth instant, to whom was referred, on the fourteenth ultimo, the memorial of John Hobby, late Marshal of the district of Maine; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

MONDAY, January 11.

Another member, to wit: SETH HASTINGS, from Massachusetts, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

A petition of Thomas Bruff, of Joseph, in the State of Maryland, dentist, was presented to the House and read, praying the aid and patronage of Congress, to enable the petitioner to complete a machine for producing perpetual motion, or to perform continual revolutions without winding; the principles of which he discovered in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety.—Referred to Mr. SOUTHARD, Mr. LOWNDES, and Mr. MITCHILL, the committee to whom was referred, on the fifth instant, the petition of Lewis Dupre, on the same subject.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do agree to an amendment to the eleventh rule of the joint rules and orders of the House, relating to "Committees of the whole House," so as the said rule shall read as follows:

"That no person shall be admitted within the bar of the lobby, but members of the Senate, officers of the General or State Governments, and foreign Ministers:"

And, on the question that the House do agree to the said amendment, it passed in the negative.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a memorial and documents of the Commissioners of the City of Washington; which were referred to Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. BAYARD, Mr. JOHN TALIAFERRO, jun., Mr. HASTINGS, and Mr. ALSTON.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the 4th instant, on the memorial of John Hobby, late Marshal of the district of Maine; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient to appoint a committee to bring in a bill to authorize and direct the Marshal of the district of Maine to discharge from confinement John Hobby, late Marshal of the said district, on his making a surrender of all his property to the United States.

Ordered, That Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. JOHN TRIGG, and Mr. STEWART, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. JACKSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 7th instant, the memorial of Isaac Zane, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GRISWOLD, from the committee to whom was referred, on the fourth instant, a letter from Samuel Dexter, late Secretary of War, made a report; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized to adjust the account of Samuel Dexter, Esq., for the expense which has arisen, or which may arise, in defending against the suit of Joseph Hodgson, brought on the covenants in the lease of a house improved for a War Office; and that the same be paid from the Treasury of the United States.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. GRISWOLD, Mr. HANNA, Mr. DENNIS, Mr. EUSTIS, and Mr. NICHOLSON, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. VARNUM, from the committee appointed, on the thirtieth ultimo, presented a bill fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill for the protection of the commerce and seamen of the United States, in the Mediterranean and adjoining seas; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the resolutions of the Senate respecting Captain Sterret; when, after some consideration thereof, the Committee rose, and the House refused them liberty to sit again.

This was done at the suggestion of several members, that it would be the most proper course to refer the resolutions to a select committee, for the purpose of ascertaining the degree of honor, that it would be fit to bestow upon Captain Sterret, his officers, and crew. After this vote, a reference was made to a select committee.

MEDITERRANEAN TRADE.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved a resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to lay before the House an estimate of the value of the exports of the United States, for the last five years, to ports situated within the Straits of Gibraltar, discriminating articles of American growth from other productions.

Mr. RANDOLPH observed that he was aware of the inability of the Secretary to distinguish precisely the exports of the United States, carried to the Mediterranean ports of France and Spain, from those carried to their other ports. But still he thought it probable that the Secretary might be able to furnish information that would be valuable.

Mr. S. SMITH said that when the report was made by the Secretary, it would be a report of deception. A great part of our trade to the Mediterranean had been lopped off in consequence of the war.

Mr. SMITH afterwards remarked that on the report being made, he feared the inquiry would be, whether we should give up the protection of the Mediterranean trade, or not. Gentlemen would probably go into a calculation of figures; and if the expense of protection appeared to be greater than the benefit of the trade, they might be for withholding protection. There was one description of trade to the Mediterranean, which we could obtain no estimate of, which was however very important—the tonnage of American shipping employed in going from European ports to the Mediterranean, and from the Mediterranean to European ports, and American shipping employed between the East Indies and the Mediterranean. This trade the Government was as much bound to protect, as it was bound to protect the landed interest of the country. Still Mr. S. knew not that it would be proper to oppose the passage of a resolution that asked for information.

Mr. SMILIE knew not what information we could receive; but he knew that whatever it should be, it could do no harm.

Mr. NICHOLSON remarked that the House would not be in a worse situation after the report than it was now. For himself, he was in a state of total ignorance, and he believed a large part of the House was also ignorant of the extent of our Mediterranean trade. It was impossible that the House could be deceived by the report; as, if any part of it should be calculated to deceive us, his colleague would be able to detect its errors. He had heard, and that too from commercial men, that our Mediterranean trade was not valuable, and not worth the expense of the squadron fitted out to protect it. He was at a loss to decide between these opinions and those of his colleague.

Mr. MITCHILL spoke in favor of the resolution.

Mr. GRISWOLD had no objection to obtaining the estimate, if desired by gentlemen; not that he supposed the report could present the information that was desired. With regard to our Mediterranean trade, it was well known, that lately, owing to our contest with Algiers, our fish and oil went in European bottoms, which could not be noticed in the Treasury statements, as they went first to other ports.

Mr. EUSTIS was perfectly willing to obtain the report, that the great increase in our trade to the Mediterranean should be seen; from which its great value would fully appear, and its claim to encouragement.

Mr. VARNUM suggested the propriety of a reference to a select committee, which, from the documents before the House, could select the desired information.

Mr. RUTLEDGE feared, that the call for this information would delay the passage of an important bill before the House for the protection of our Mediterranean commerce. He hoped, in order as promptly as possible to obtain information, the Secretary of the Treasury would be called upon for it. With respect to the protection of our trade in the Mediterranean, it was, in his opinion, unimportant what its extent was. We were bound to protect the commerce of our citizens in all its ramifications, whether great or small.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Duty on Salt.

JANUARY, 1802.

TUESDAY, January 12.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act concerning the library for the use of both Houses of Congress," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. J. C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the fourteenth ultimo, the petition of Caleb Eddy, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of extending to the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia a further time for exhibiting their claims for lands, under the "Act for the relief of the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia," made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State, containing an estimate of the expenses necessary for carrying into effect the Convention between the United States of America and the French Republic; which Message, and papers accompanying the same, were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the committee appointed yesterday, presented a bill authorizing the discharge of John Hobby, from his confinement; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House.

DUTY ON SALT.

Mr. BAYARD moved the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the duty on salt."

On which motion, the previous question being called for by five members, to wit: "Shall the main question to agree to the said motion, be now put?"

And debate arising thereon, Mr. BAYARD, the member from Delaware, was called to order by Mr. RANDOLPH, one of the members from Virginia, on an opinion that he was debating the merits of the main question; and the SPEAKER having decided that the member from Delaware was in order, an appeal was made to the House from the decision of the Chair; and, on the question, "Is the member from Delaware in order?" it was resolved in the affirmative. And then, after farther debate, the previous question was taken, to wit, "Shall the main question to agree to the said motion be now put?" and passed in the negative—yeas 41, nays 49, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, January 13.

Ordered, That so much of the report of the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business, as relates to the claim of the legal representatives of Samuel Lapsley, deceased, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means be authorized to report by bill or bills, or otherwise, on all such matters, as shall, from time to time, be referred to them by the House.

A bill was reported which provides for indemnifying Samuel Dexter for any expenses that may be incurred by him in consequence of the suit instituted by Joseph Hodgson, and for any judgment that may be rendered in that suit. The bill was read twice, and referred to a Committee of the whole House.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of John Hobby.

Mr. GREGG proposed an amendment to the bill which would provide the same relief for a collector of excise in the county of Northampton, State of Pennsylvania, who was a delinquent for about two thousand dollars, and had been confined in jail for more than two years.

MESSRS. RUTLEDGE, MASON, and HUGER, opposed the amendment. They urged the propriety of deciding upon every case of this kind singly. They stated the importance of being very cautious in granting relief to the receivers of public money who embezzled or squandered it away.

The amendment was not agreed to.

MESSRS. STANLEY, BACON, and ELMENDORF, opposed the bill. They thought such defaulters should be rigorously dealt with, to deter others from violating the public confidence reposed in them.

MESSRS. DAVIS, PERKINS, WADSWORTH, and S. SMITH, advocated the bill.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill with amendments, which were agreed to, and it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow, forty-four voting in favor of it.

Mr. RANDOLPH, with leave, presented a bill to amend an act, entitled, "An act to lay and collect a direct tax;" which was read twice, and made the order of the day for Friday, and ordered to be printed.

This bill provides for the collection of the arrearages of that tax.

The House then took up the bill respecting the Library, as amended by the Senate: they agreed to some of the amendments and disagreed to others.

The Senate proposed that the Librarian should be appointed by the President, which the House did not agree to.

Mr. S. SMITH observed that the law regulating coin would expire at the end of this session of Congress, and that great inconvenience would be experienced by the banks and individuals; as foreign gold was not to be received in payment of duties, &c. He therefore moved that a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to continue in force the present law on the subject of foreign coin. The motion was agreed to, and then the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 14.

Another member, to wit: JOHN DAWSON, from Virginia, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

An engrossed bill authorizing the discharge of John Hobby from his confinement was read the third time and passed.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill to prevent intrusions on the public lands, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Secretary of State, to whom was referred, on the 14th ultimo, the memorial of Philip Sloan; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to authorize the payment of two thousand eight hundred dollars to Philip Sloan, from the Treasury of the United States, as a full compensation for his claims.

Ordered, That Mr. JONES, Mr. CLOPTON, and Mr. HUGER, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand eight hundred and two; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on the first Monday in February next.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred, on the 7th instant, the petition of Isaac Zane, which lay on the table: Whereupon,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill authorizing the President of the United States to convey, in fee simple, to Isaac Zane, six sections of land, of one square mile each, within the Northwestern Territory, on any lands not heretofore appropriated, and that the Indian title thereto has been extinguished.

Ordered, That Mr. JACKSON, Mr. FEARING, and Mr. VAN HORNE, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, enclosing certain laws of the Northwestern and Indiana Territories of the United States, in pursuance of a resolution of this House, of the twenty-fourth ultimo; which were read and ordered to lie on the table.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, January 15.

A petition of sundry citizens of the District of Columbia, in opposition to a petition from other citizens of the said District, presented on the twenty-third ultimo, "praying the aid and patronage of Congress in the establishment of a company for the building of a bridge across the Potomac river, from the western and southern extremity of the Maryland Avenue, in the City of Washington, to the nearest and most convenient point of Alexander's Island, in the said river," was presented to the House and read.—Referred to the committee appointed, on the eighth ultimo, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations or amendments may be necessary in the existing government and laws of the District of Columbia.

Ordered, That so much of the Message from the President of the United States, of the twenty-second ultimo, as relates to a schedule of the whole number of persons within the district of Tennessee, be printed for the use of the members.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill, entitled "An act concerning the library for the use of both Houses of Congress," and desire a conference with this House on the subject-matter of the said amendments; to which conference the Senate have appointed managers on their part.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made report on the petition of Thomas K. Jones, of Boston. It was in favor of granting the drawback on ten pipes of wine re-exported.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. JONES presented a petition from the assessors of the direct tax in the city and county of Philadelphia, praying for additional compensation.—Referred to a committee of three, viz: Mr. JONES, Mr. JOHN C. SMITH, and Mr. SMITH of New York.

Mr. GREGG moved that the return of the census of Tennessee, should be printed, to make the documents on that subject complete. Agreed to.

Mr. DAWSON (who took his seat yesterday) observed, that he understood some gentlemen were in doubt whether he was entitled to a seat. He wished the Committee of Elections to make an early report, that if the employ with which he had been honored was incompatible with the character of a legislator, according to the Constitution which he had sworn to support, it would be so declared; and that the district which had chosen him might have an opportunity of again expressing their sentiments in the choice of a representative.

Mr. S. SMITH observed, there could be no difficulty in the gentleman's taking his seat until the Committee of Elections should make their report.

Mr. MILLEDGE, chairman of the Committee of Elections, mentioned that there were no credentials relative to Mr. DAWSON before the committee. Mr. M. had written to the Governor of Virginia, on Monday last, on the subject, and expected an answer by Monday next.

FUGITIVE BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the bill respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters.

The bill contemplates inflicting a penalty of five hundred dollars on any person harboring, concealing, or employing, runaway slaves. Every person employing a black person, unless he had a certificate with a county seal to it, or signed by a justice of the peace, would be liable to the penalty.

The debate on the bill was protracted until after three o'clock.

It was opposed by Messrs. VARNUM, BACON, T. MORRIS, EUSTIS, SMILIE, GODDARD, DANA, HEMPHILL, and SOUTHARD, who were in general unwilling that he who should employ a black person who was a stranger to him, and did not, within one month, publish in two newspapers an advertisement giving a description of the person so employed, should incur a penalty of five hundred dollars. They did not wish to compel every free person of color in the Middle and Eastern States to procure and carry about with them such a certificate.

The bill was supported by Messrs. NICHOLSON, HUGER, RUTLEDGE, VAN NESS, CLAIBORNE, and HOLLAND. They considered it a great injury, to the owners of that species of property, that runaways were employed in the Middle and Northern States, and even assisted in procuring a living. They stated that when slaves ran away and were not recovered it excited discontent among the rest. When they were caught and brought home they informed their comrades how well they were received and assisted, which excited a disposition in others to attempt escaping, and obliged their masters to use greater severity than they otherwise would. It was, they said, even on the score of humanity, good policy in those opposed to slavery to agree to this law.

A motion was made to strike out the second section of the bill, which would create therein and inflict the penalty for employing a person of color who had not a certificate of his freedom. The Committee were equally divided, thirty-eight voting for striking out and thirty-eight against; so the motion was not carried.

The Committee then rose, and a motion was made to adjourn, but did not succeed. The House took up the amendments of the Committee, but, before they got through them, an adjournment was carried, and the House adjourned until Monday.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from Samuel Coleman, Assistant Clerk to the Council of the State of Virginia, enclosing a return of the election of JOHN DAWSON, to serve as a Representative for the said State, in the seventh Congress of the United States; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Elections.

A petition of John Cleves Symmes was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will accept of the release and relinquishment of the petitioner, to the United States, of all his legal and equitable claim, and colorable right, by patent or contract, statute or possession, whatsoever, to a certain quantity of land, lying north of the lands granted by the United States, or a contract with the petitioner and his associates, in the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, for the reasons and on the terms and conditions therein specified.—Referred to the committee to whom was referred, on the eighth ultimo, the petition of James McCashen and others; and that Mr. D. HEISTER, and Mr. CLAIBORNE, be added to the said committee.

A petition of sundry citizens of the District of Columbia, in opposition to the prayer of a petition from sundry other citizens of the said district, presented on the twenty-ninth ultimo, for the erection of a bridge from the western and southern extremity of the Maryland avenue, in the City of Washington, to the nearest and most convenient point of Alexander's Island, in the river Potomac, was presented to the House and read.—Referred to the committee appointed, on the eighth ultimo, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations or amendments may be necessary in the existing government and laws of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter and report from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a statement of the value of the exports of the United States, to the ports of Italy, Gibraltar, and the Barbary Powers, for each of the five years preceding the thirtieth of September, one thousand eight hundred and one, in pursuance of the resolution of this House of the eleventh instant; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the seventh instant, the bill for the protection of the commerce and seamen of the United States in the Mediterranean and adjoining seas.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate of the fifteenth instant, on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill, entitled "An act concerning the Library for the use of both Houses of Congress;" Whereupon,

JANUARY, 1802.

Fugitive Bill.

H. OF R.

Resolved, That this House doth insist on their disagreement to the fourth, sixth, and seventh amendments of the Senate, disagreed to by this House, and insisted on by the Senate to the said bill.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the conference desired by the Senate on the subject-matter of the said amendments, and that Mr. BAYARD, Mr. NICHOLSON, and Mr. DAWSON, be appointed Managers at the said conference on the part of this House.

FUGITIVE BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported on the fifteenth instant from the Committee of the whole House to the bill to amend the act, entitled, "An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters;" and the same being severally twice read, were, on the question being put thereon, agreed to by the House.

The said bill was then further amended at the Clerk's table: and on the question that the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed and read the third time, it passed in the negative—yeas 43, nays 46, as follows:

NAYS—John Bacon, Phaniel Bishop, Robert Brown, John Condit, Manasseh Cutler, Richard Cutts, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport William Eustis, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Andrew Gregg, Roger Griswold, John A. Hanna, Seth Hastings, Joseph Hemphill, Archibald Henderson, William Hoge, Ebenezer Mattoon, Samuel L. Mitchell, Thomas Morris, Jas. Mott, Joseph Pierce, Elias Perkins, Nathan Read, William Shepard, John Smilie, Israel Smith, John Cotton Smith, John Smith, of New York, Josiah Smith, Henry Southard, John Stanley, Joseph Stanton, jr., John Stewart, Benjamin Tallmadge, Samuel Tenney, Thomas Tillinghast, George B. Upham, Joseph B. Varnum, Isaac Van Horne, Kilian K. Van Rensselaer, Peleg Wadsworth, Benjamin Walker, Lemuel Williams, Henry Woods.

And so the said bill was rejected.

TUESDAY, January 19.

A memorial of Fulwar Skipwith, late Consul General of the United States at Paris, was presented to the House and read, praying the liquidation and settlement of a claim for official services rendered, and advances of money made by the memorialist, in the capacity aforesaid, on account of the United States.—Referred to the Secretary of State, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

A petition of sundry inhabitants of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, was presented to the House and read, praying the aid and patronage of Congress to enable the petitioners and others to connect the waters of the river Potomac and the Eastern Branch of the said river, by opening and completing a canal along the Tiber creek, through the low ground at the foot of the Capitol Hill, in said city.—Referred to the Committee appointed on the eighth ultimo, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations or amendments may be necessary in the existing government and laws of the District of Columbia.

Mr. STANLEY, one of the members from North Carolina, presented to the House a petition of Memucan Hunt, William Polk, and Pleasant Henderson, for themselves and others, addressed to the General Assembly of that State; also, sundry resolutions of the said Assembly, respecting a claim of the petitioners for the value of certain lands in the State of Tennessee, held under grants from the State of North Carolina, prior to the cession of the said lands to the United States, accepted by an act of Congress passed the second day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety; which were received and read: Whereupon, Ordered, That the said petition and resolutions be referred to Mr. STANLEY, Mr. RUTLEDGE, Mr. DAWSON, Mr. DICKSON, and Mr. FOWLER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report on a letter from the Governor of Maryland, and sundry documents respecting loans from the said State to the Commissioners of the City of Washington, referred to him by order of the House, on the seventh instant; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the committee appointed on the eleventh instant, to whom was referred a Message of the President of the United States on the same subject.

Mr. TALLMADGE, from the committee to whom were referred, on the eleventh instant, the resolutions of the Senate, "in respect to Lieutenant Sterret, the officers, and crew, of the United States schooner Enterprize," made a report; which was read, and, together with the said resolutions, ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, January 20.

A petition of sundry citizens of the District of Columbia, in opposition to the prayer of a petition from sundry other citizens of the said District, presented on the twenty-ninth ultimo, "that a bridge may be erected from the western and southern extremity of Maryland avenue, in the City of Washington, to the nearest and most convenient point of Alexander's Island, in the river Potomac," was presented to the House and read.—Referred to the committee appointed, on the eighth ultimo, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary in the existing government and laws of the District of Columbia.

Mr. FEARING presented a law of the Legislature of the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, for the division of that Territory into three Governments, the Western, Middle, and Eastern, and pointing out the boundaries for States as laid out by the Old Confederation. Mr. F. moved to refer it to a select committee.

Mr. GILES observed, that the law would place the people of that Territory in a very disagreeable situation, and it should be decided as early as possible. He had in his hands petitions signed by above one thousand inhabitants of that Territory against the law. The law would remove them further from a State government. Its only tendency would be to perpetuate the office of Governor and the Territorial Legislature.

Mr. DAVIS moved to refer the law to a Committee of the whole House, as it would give an earlier decision to the subject.

It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GILES then presented the petitions he alluded to, and moved a reference to the Committee of the Whole, and one of them to be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS mentioned that he had received a communication from the Treasury Department respecting the location of military land warrants, which he moved should be printed; agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON moved that the ordinance of 1787, respecting the Northwestern Territory, should be printed for the use of the members; which was agreed to.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be authorized to cause to be printed under their inspection, all such reports and documents, touching the matters referred to them, as may appear necessary to the committee, previous to the presentation of the same to the House.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The House then took up the amendments to the bill fixing the Military Peace Establishment.

Mr. BAYARD moved to strike out the office of Brigadier General. He said there could not be any occasion for such an officer, as the men were scattered over the whole extent of our frontiers and Atlantic coast, and placed in small divisions.

This brought on a debate which was continued until after three o'clock.

The question was taken by yeas and nays for striking out—36 against it, 54 for it, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, James A. Bayard, William

Mr. BAYARD moved to strike out the office of Colonel, and add one to the number of Majors; but it was not agreed to.

The bill proposed to give those officers who should be deranged, three months' pay when they were dismissed from the service.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to strike out "three months," that a greater compensation might be given to those who have grown gray in the service of their country. He thought more was due to them than what the bill proposed to allow.

Mr. VARNUM said, his own opinion was in favor of a greater compensation; but he owed it to a majority of that House to yield his opinion to what they had fixed it at. He said there was nothing due to those officers, as nothing had been promised them.

Mr. MITCHELL was in favor of striking out, for the purpose of inserting a compensation proportionate to the length of time the officers had been in service.

Mr. BACON differed as to the principle laid down by gentlemen. When officers were wanted there was great competition for the appointments. They were desirous to receive the pay and emoluments. He did not think there was anything due to them.

Mr. S. SMITH was for pursuing some system in this business, and keeping to a uniform principle. When a reduction was made in 1796, six months' pay and subsistence was granted. He would be in favor of that at this time.

Mr. DANA believed those officers accepted their appointments under an idea of its being the permanent Peace Establishment, and therefore something was due to them when dismissed from the public service.

Military Peace Establishment.

H. OF R.

Mr. SMILIE said, they knew the terms on which they entered the service, and they entered voluntarily. How could anything, then, be due to them? It would be more proper to give the men something when disbanded than to provide for the officers. It was not long since that about forty were wanted, and there were thirteen hundred applications. Men could not always be obtained. When the ten regiments were ordered to be raised, the officers were soon obtained; but, after recruiting a long time, the proper number of men could not be procured.

The question for striking out was taken by yeas and nays—for it 26, against it 56, as follows:

Mr. S. SMITH made a motion to raise it to the same as was granted in 1796.

Mr. EUSTIS advocated it, but it was not carried, there being 26 for it, and 45 against it.

Mr. S. SMITH moved a section repealing former laws that came within the purview of this.

Mr. BAYARD did not think such a section necessary; at any rate, he wished time to consider what laws came within the purview of this, before he agreed to it.

Mr. GILES advocated the section; which was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

THURSDAY, January 21.

A petition of Anthony Addison, of Prince George's county, in the State of Maryland, was presented to the House and read, praying that he may be authorized by law to erect a bridge over the Eastern Branch of the river Potomac, at, or near the place where a ferry belonging to the petitioner is now kept.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee appointed, on the eighth ultimo, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations or amendments may be necessary in the existing government and laws of the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, it was Resolved, That the committee appointed, on the fourteenth ultimo, "to inquire and report whether moneys drawn from the Treasury have been faithfully applied to the objects for which they were appropriated, and whether the same have been regularly accounted for; and to report, likewise, whether any further arrangements are necessary to promote economy, enforce adherence to Legislative restrictions, and secure the accountability of persons intrusted with public money," be, and they are, authorized to cause to be printed, for the use of the members of the House, such papers and documents relating to the subjects of their inquiry as they may think necessary.

Mr. DAVENPORT, from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, presented a bill to continue in force an act supplementary to an act, entitled "An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate adhere to their fourth and sixth amendments, and recede from their seventh amendment to the bill, entitled "An act concerning the Library for the use of both Houses of Congress," on their disagreement to which this House hath insisted.

On motion, it was Ordered, That Mr. NICHOLSON be excused from serving on the committee appointed, on the fourth instant, "to inquire whether any, and what, alteration should be made in the Judicial Establishment of the United States; also, to report a provision for securing the impartial selection of juries in the courts of the United States," and that Mr. GILES be appointed of the said committee, in his stead.

Mr. BAYARD, from the managers appointed on the part of this House to attend a conference with the Senate on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill, entitled "An act concerning the Library for the use of both Houses of Congress," made a report; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth recede from their disagreement to the fourth and sixth amendments, adhered to by the Senate to the said bill.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

An engrossed bill fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States was read the third time.

Mr. BAYARD observed that he should vote for the bill, because he thought it better than the former system, and it would be of much saving as to expense. He was, however, very far from being pleased with a part of that bill, that part relating to the Brigadier General and his aid de camp. This office he knew to be a perfect sinecure; no such officer was necessary; he could have no duties to perform. He would not, however, vote against the whole bill on account of this.

Mr. RUTLEDGE.—The first section was very disagreeable to him, as it went to the establishment of a perfect sinecure. He was willing to do homage to the merit of the officer who was to benefit; but he rather thought it would be more consonant with justice, if money must be needlessly sported with, to suffer such money to be given to those who have been long in service—some fifteen or twenty years—and who are now by this bill suddenly forced to quit their present, to seek some new way of obtaining a livelihood, in circumstances, many of them perhaps, not enviable.

Mr. R. was not pleased with the so great reduction of the artillery; he thought the retention of the artillery of more importance than that of the infantry. He had hoped the artillery would have been retained to keep in order the forts already built in different part of the United States; the small number remaining was quite incompetent to preserving them in order, or preserving them from decay. The Secretary of War mentions one fort in South Carolina. There are, sir, four forts in the harbor of Charleston alone, some of which must go to decay. He should vote for the bill, because it went to make great reductions of expense, which reductions circumstances now allow us to afford; but the sinecure was obnoxious to him, and he was not pleased with the reduction of the artillery.

On the question that the bill do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, John Bacon, James A. Bayard, Phaniel Bishop, Richard Brent, Robert Brown, William Butler, John Campbell, Thomas Claiborne, Matthew Clay, John Condit, Manasseh Cutler, Richard Cutts, Samuel W. Dana, Thomas T. Davis, John Dawson, John Dennis, William Dickinson, Lucas El-mendorf, Ebenezer Elmer, William Eustis, Abiel Foster, John Fowler, William B. Giles, Edwin Gray, Andrew Gregg, William B. Grove, John A. Hanna, Seth Hastings, Daniel Heister, Joseph Heister, Wm. Helms, Joseph Hemphill, Wm. H. Hill, William Hoge, James Holland, Benjamin Huger, George Jackson, Charles Johnson, Wm. Jones, Michael Leib, Thomas Lowndes, John Milledge, Samuel L. Mitchill, Thomas Moore, Thomas Morris, James Mott, Anthony New, Thomas Newton, jr., Joseph Pierce, Nathan Reed, John Rutledge, Israel Smith, John Cotton Smith, John Smith, of New York, John Smith, of Virginia, Samuel Smith, Henry Southard, Richard Sprigg, Richard Stanford, John Stanley, Joseph Stanton, jr., John Stewart, John Taliaferro, jr., Benjamin Tallmadge, Samuel Tenney, Philip R. Thompson, Abram Trigg, John B. Upham, Philip Van Cortlandt, John P. Van Ness, Joseph B. Varnum, Isaac Van Horne, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, Peleg Wadsworth, Lemuel Williams, and Henry Woods.

NAYS—John Davenport, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, Archibald Henderson, Ebenezer Mattoon, Lewis R. Morris, Elias Perkins, John Randolph, jr., William Shepard, Josiah Smith, John Stratton, and Benjamin Walker.

MEDITERRANEAN TRADE.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill for the protection of the commerce and seamen of the United States in the Mediterranean and adjoining seas.

Mr. BAYARD offered an amendment, the purport of which was to give to the President the power of granting letters of marque and reprisal, to affect Algiers and Tunis as well as Tripoli. Mr. B. thought that it would be unsafe to neglect a cautionary step like this, because there was great danger, from the similarity of religion and manners, of a union taking place between Tunis, Algiers, and Tripoli; they may be brought into the war with Tripoli against us. It would be a matter of prudence to be prepared.

Mr. DANA thought it very probable that further information would be received from the Barbary Powers, when we shall be the better enabled to judge what will be expedient. He did not like the appearance of the amendment; it seemed to invite war.

Mr. BAYARD considered there was a great difference between the Barbary Powers and civilized nations; it was on account of the perfidiousness of those Powers, that he wished it left to the direction of the President to exercise the power vested in him when he should think proper; there was no trusting to them. He wished the President to do this by the authority of law; this would prevent those doubts that have been expressed, by some, of the constitutionality of his measures the last Spring and Summer; though for his part he was disposed to approbate the proceedings of the Executive on that occasion. As to its having the appearance of threatening, he did not think so; nor did he believe it would have any effect on those Powers; he hardly believed that the Dey of Algiers ever read the acts of Congress.

Mr. DANA was opposed to considering the subject at present; he was for postponing till further information should be received.

Mr. GILES was against the amendment; he thought it had the appearance of inviting them to an attack, of challenging them to combat, of irritating and provoking them: he believed there would be ample time to act on this matter hereafter, when they would have a better knowledge of circumstances, and of what to expect.

Mr. BAYARD said he was by no means disposed to withdraw his motion. You are at war with one of these nations; the others are connected with them by their religion and habits, by their government some, and by their interest more. I have been told that there is no connexion between my amendment and the bill; but I am confident there is the same connexion that there is between Tripoli and the other Powers; and it is proper to extend the bill so as to embrace Tunis and Algiers, as well as Tripoli. The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) says there are no doubts on his mind but that the President has a Constitutional right, as the Commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy, to do as he has done; but it should be remembered that many have doubts; and why should the gentleman be opposed to this amendment, which will preclude all doubt on the subject?

The amendment was not carried.

DIRECT TAXES.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill for amending the act for laying and collecting a direct tax.

The first section repeals the thirteenth section of the act of 1798, which prescribes that lands on which taxes remain unpaid for one year, shall be sold, subject to the right of redemption within two years after sale.

Mr. RANDOLPH stated that the provisions proposed to be repealed were unsusceptible of execution, inasmuch as the expenses of advertising required, exceeded in many cases, by four or five times, the amount of the tax, and which exceeded the per centage allowed; and inasmuch as no person would buy the land offered for sale, when he might be deprived of it by a redemption within two years.

Documents were read, which substantiated this statement.

Mr. S. SMITH opposed the repeal, as going to deprive the owners of lands of the right of redemption; which he deemed a valuable provision; without which the owners of land, particularly non-residents, would be deprived of their property, without a knowledge of the tax imposed, or being able, however desirous, to pay it.

Mr. RUTLEDGE also opposed the repeal, as imposing hardships upon those who have not paid the tax, which were not imposed upon those who have paid. He further stated that the non-payment in the Southern States had arisen, not from indisposition to pay, but from want of collectors to carry the law into execution; the compensation allowed having been so inadequate as in many districts to have disabled the Government from obtaining officers.

Messrs. GRISWOLD, MILLEDGE, STANLEY, and MORRIS, delivered their sentiments against the first section; when, on motion of Mr. MACON, the Committee rose, and asked leave to sit again, which was granted.

FRIDAY, January 22.

Another member to wit: ROBERT WILLIAMS, from North Carolina, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

An engrossed bill for the protection of the commerce and seamen of the United States in the Mediterranean and adjoining seas, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JACKSON, from the committee appointed, on the fourteenth instant, presented a bill for the relief of Isaac Zane; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Mr. JOHN C. SMILIE, from the Committee of Claims made report on the petition of William Kilty, Chief Justice of the District of Columbia.

The committee were of opinion that when he accepted of his appointment he knew the duties required from him and the salary; they were not therefore in favor of increasing his salary.

The House concurred with the report, and leave was granted to withdraw the petition.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the unfinished business of yesterday, viz: a bill respecting the arrearages of the direct tax.

The first section of the bill was struck out, and Mr. ELMENDORF proposed some amendments.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved that the Committee should rise, that the bill might be referred back to a select committee, as it was difficult to settle the detail of a bill in the House. The Committee rose and were discharged. The bill was recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. DENNIS proposed two resolutions, one respecting the establishment of a Chancery Court in the District of Columbia; the other relating to the public lots, squares, and streets, in the City of Washington, which had never yet been properly conveyed to the United States. There were also different plans of the city; he considered it important that public sanction should be given to the more correct one.

Mr. RANDOLPH observed that in the statement of indemnities under the treaty with France a large sum was put down for captures which were not brought into the United States, and which were condemned. Those made by the public armed vessels amounted to $122,000. He wished to know how far the commanders of the public and other vessels were authorized by their instructions in making these captures. He proposed a resolution, nearly as follows: Resolved, That the Secretaries of State and the Treasury be directed to lay before this House copies of all the instructions given to every description of vessels to capture French vessels.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the select committee appointed on the subject, made a report which proposes to give four months' pay to the representatives of the officers, seamen, and marines, who were on board the Insurgent, and that the widows and children should have half pay for five years.

The resolutions were twice read, referred to a Committee of the whole House, and made the order of the day for Tuesday.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. RUTLEDGE rose and observed, that he intended to move a resolution calling the attention of the Committee of Ways and Means to the articles of brown sugar, bohea tea, and coffee. There was not a hut or log-house in this extensive country where these articles were not used. The duty on sugar and tea was fifty per cent. on the original cost, and coffee forty per cent. It was, he said, essentially necessary to reduce these high duties on what may fairly be termed necessities of life. The general peace in Europe would be followed by a reduction in the price of articles generally, and the earnings of labor in this country would not be so much as heretofore, as the price of produce would not be so high in the coming period as in the past.

From this view of the subject, it became them to look into the duties, and see whether they would not reduce those on the necessities of life. These articles, from the customs and habits of the poor, might be deemed as much the necessities of life as salt. Mr. R. was sorry the article of salt was not permitted to go to the Committee, when proposed the other day by his honorable friend from Delaware. When gentlemen said they were pleased to see it emanate from the quarter it did, he expected a unanimous vote in favor of the resolution respecting salt; he did not revert to what so suddenly took place when gentlemen immediately changed their minds.

Mr. R. said, what he was about to propose was a very favorite project with him, not only that it should go to the Committee, but be carried through the House.

We are told that such is the prosperity of the country that we may reduce even the taxes on luxuries—carriages, stamps, &c., have been particularly mentioned.

Mr. R. then read his resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the duties on brown sugar, coffee, and bohea tea."

There was a call for the question, and also that it should be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. CLAIBORNE hoped the resolution would be treated as it deserved. He was surprised when he saw gentlemen who were formerly so fond of this mode of taxation, now so strenuous against it. He could not view the resolution in any other light than being introduced merely for popularity. He did not blame gentlemen for a wish to be popular; he liked the principle, but would vote against the resolution, and still he would maintain his popularity. Unless gentlemen would show him they could repeal the internal taxes, and part with some of the remaining revenues, and yet leave sufficient for the exigencies of Government, he would not agree to this resolution. Do gentlemen, who are for taking the funds from the present Administration, like it less than they did the last? He thought they did not. Mr. C. hoped the mover of the resolution would let it lie for consideration.

The question was again called for.

Mr. DANA hoped the proposition would be treated as it ought, and that it would not be scouted from the House without consideration, because it interfered with a favorite measure of some gentlemen.

Mr. D. said, upon general principles, he was in favor of the resolution going to the committee, that a fair comparison between the external and internal duties might be made. The duties on articles then before the House, were specific and not ad valorem duties, and they were laid with a view to war prices, and not what they would be in time of peace. Thirteen per cent. was about the average rate of ad valorem duties, and twenty per cent. the highest, and those were the articles consumed by the wealthy.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows clearly that the price of the articles in the resolution are nearly all doubled in war, and the duty is not to fall with the fall of prices in time of peace, yet the ad valorem duties come down with the prices of the articles.

Is there, said Mr. D., a single principle of finance in favor of the inequality? The same proportion of duties to prices should be observed in peace as in war, or it would be a great temptation to smuggle. Wicked people would engage in it, if strong temptation were thrown in their way. For this reason the duties should be reduced.

There was another point of view in which this subject should be considered—that the duties were paid chiefly by the commercial part of the community.

Mr. D. said he knew they were doomed to bear whatever certain gentlemen chose to lay upon them; but he would not be laughed out of the object which his duty pointed out to him. The articles in the resolution were more used in the Northern than Southern States, and were paid chiefly by the poor; therefore, the proposed inquiry was perfectly proper, unless gentlemen were determined the internal duties should first be repealed, before any consideration should take place, as to what duties were most proper to be reduced.

Mr. S. SMITH observed, that he did not rise to offer any arguments against the resolution, as he did not consider it intended for that House, but for the public. He was opposed to the resolution because the subject was already generally before the committee.

Mr. RUTLEDGE said, he would state, for the information of the gentleman from Maryland, that he might not hereafter misunderstand him, that he always had one meaning in what he said to that House. The good of the people was the object he had in view.

Mr. GRISWOLD said, according to his idea, this subject was not before the committee; they had the subject of duties generally before them, and would make a general report; but if these three articles are referred, they must report on them, and the House must decide specifically on these three. Were gentlemen afraid to let the House decide on these three?

He was at a loss to see any reasons for such an objection. The tax on sugar and coffee was fifty per cent. on the first cost, and on tea more. It becomes a matter of serious consideration, said Mr. G., whether you can retain the present taxes on them in time of peace, and prevent smuggling. It is a clear principle, that revenue is diminished when taxes are carried too far. When we connect with this truth, the fact that these articles are of prime necessity, and used principally by the poor, and it is determined the rich shall not pay for their carriages, &c., it cannot be denied that this resolution ought to go to the committee for their consideration?

Mr. DANA thought it prudent for the gentleman from Maryland to decline answering the arguments urged in favor of the resolution. The duty on the articles included in it amounted to $220,000.

JANUARY, 1802.

Import Duties.

H. OF R.

Mr. BAYARD did not know but it would be giving the House unnecessary trouble to offer his sentiments on the resolution. As no arguments had been used against it, it was not to be presumed that a majority of the House could be opposed to it.

The object of the resolution was not to diminish but to make inquiry on the subject, and know whether the duty on certain articles, the consumers of which were but little able to pay it, might not be reduced. Will gentlemen scout it out of the House, as has been said, without deigning to answer the arguments in favor of the measure? It has been said, Mr. B. observed, that the subject is referred generally. The general reference is not for the committee to inquire into the propriety of reducing the duties, but to know whether the laws are sufficiently energetic to insure the collection of the duties, and to bring all the laws, on the subject of the revenue, into such a compass as to be more plain and simple. The general reference has nothing to do with the motion before the House.

The fortunate situation in which we find ourselves, enables gentlemen on all sides to agree in reducing the public expenses. By the bill reducing the Army $450,000 will be saved, much also in the Naval department, and a vast deal in the Civil List, perhaps $800,000. Is it not expedient to make inquiry on the subject? Must we confine ourselves to philosophic revenues alone, without any reference to what is useful? Because it has been mentioned by the President in his Message, that the taxes on luxuries may be reduced, shall we inquire as to the necessities of life and the interests of the country? Will not gentlemen give up their favorite project as to internal taxes, even for the welfare of the country?

It is now before the Committee of Ways and Means to consider whether the internal revenues may not be altogether abolished.

The resolution, Mr. B. said, which he had the honor to propose a few days ago, was to have the salt tax compared with the tax on carriages, and thus determine which would be the most beneficial to the country, to be reduced or abolished. Gentlemen gave the subject the go-by, by the previous question. Now they are prepared to vote on this without saying a word. Mr. B. trusted the motives of his friends were as pure and patriotic as theirs. He said, we wish the subject to go to the committee that the necessary burdens might be placed on those who were best able to bear them.

Mr. GODDARD alluded to the observation which was made, as to the motive in bringing forward this resolution, that it was not for that House but the public, and said we must be permitted to attend to the interest of our constituents. He thought there was more cause for alarm when gentlemen said, and it would go forth to the world, that the subject of the resolution was already before the committee. It amounts to saying you shall not direct the committee to any particular articles, because they have the general reference before them. The committee, under the general reference, are to inquire respecting the duties, as to their effect on finance, not as to the burdens they impose on the people. Those who oppose the reference of the resolution offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, do not treat with proper respect those who complain of grievances.

Mr. SMILIE said, gentlemen complain that their arguments are not answered. He thought there was not a new idea started in the course of the debate; perhaps there could not be anything said either for or against the resolution, different from what was said when the resolution respecting salt was before the House. It would, therefore, be a mere waste of time to answer gentlemen.

Mr. CLAIBORNE never thought it a waste of time to debate on any subject that came before the House. He continued: I said it had a tendency to popularity; that was an inadvertent expression. I did not mean to propose that the motion should be scouted from the House; I would never treat gentlemen with such disrespect. I asked the mover to let it lie on the table until we repealed the excise. When we have done that I will agree to this resolution, if we can spare any more from our revenue.

Mr. RUTLEDGE replied to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SMILIE,) as to the charge that there were no new arguments that day. Mr. R. said, either the gentleman from Pennsylvania has not heard the arguments that have been used this day, or I did not hear those which were used when the resolutions relating to salt were before the House. He alleged, nothing new has been said. I think that nothing has been said analogous to what was expressed about the salt tax. The articles in this resolution are, of all the foreign productions, most consumed; they are most generally consumed; indeed, almost exclusively, by the poor; whereas, salt is an article of general consumption, and but a small proportion by the poor. Are not these facts? Look at the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. The duty on brown sugar is $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound, or \$2 50 per cwt., and the original cost is not more than six dollars or $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cwt. The amount of duty on brown sugar is \$903,000 annually. This shows how much is consumed, and that, too, by the poor; and yet gentlemen will not let the subject be referred to the committee.

Mr. R. adverted to the internal taxes which had been recommended to their consideration by the President in his message. He had a proper respect, he said, for the Chief Magistrate; he believed he had never treated him with disrespect, and trusted he never should.

Mr. R. continued.—Yet we are not to be stopped in this business, by being told the President has recommended a reduction of this tax, and he has not called our attention to that. It is a duty members owe their constituents, when the President has not called their attention to what bears heavy upon them, to bring it forward in this House. What! must the tax on carriages, stills, and the stamp tax, be abolished; and when we want equality of burdens only, and propose a question with that view, shall gentlemen who have a favorite project in view, say we will not hear what you have to say ; we will not answer ? Will the country be satisfied with such procedure ?

Mr. R. had no objection to the internal taxes being discontinued, but he thought they should take a comprehensive view of the subject, and see whether that would be the most favorable to the country. It is a favorite project, he said, with some gentlemen, to abolish the stamp tax ; but, Mr. R. said, his constituents did not feel it ; there was not, perhaps, one of them who paid three dollars a year ; yet he had no objection to discontinuing it. Nor did they feel the tax on stills. He thought the House should not attend exclusively to taxes that bear hard only upon particular parts of the country. To refuse a reference was not treating gentlemen with that respect which was reciprocally due from members of that House.

Mr. SOUTHWARD wished to give his reasons for voting against the resolution. He was of the same opinion as to this, that he was when the resolution respecting salt was offered to the House, he believed it completely before the committee, and it was their duty, under the general reference, to take into view each article. It was, therefore, unnecessary for members to offer resolutions on each article of importation. It was erroneous to say coffee was exclusively used by the poor ; they scarcely used any ; and brown sugar was used with coffee, and but little of it consumed by the poor ; almost the whole of these articles were used by the rich. The taxes could never fall equally upon all parts of the country. In the carriage tax, New Jersey pays more than some large States. They should go upon the general good in regard to taxation.

Mr. S. thought it unnecessary and improper in every point of view, that the Committee should be directed to each particular article. One gentleman might rise in his place, and propose a resolution on the carriage tax, another on stills, a third on stamps, and so on, to the great delay of business. It was premature to offer any resolutions, until the Committee of Ways and Means made their report on the general reference.

Mr. RUTLEDGE said, when he submitted the resolution, he did not expect any serious opposition would be made to it, but, finding it was opposed, he would vary his motion, so as to read,

“Resolved, That the duties on brown sugar and bohea tea, and coffee, ought to be reduced.”

Mr. RANDOLPH did not think the House prepared to decide on the resolution.

If the revenue should be found sufficient to extinguish the national debt within the time mentioned in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, pay the expenses of Government, repeal the internal taxes, and yet leave a surplus, he would be happy to join gentlemen in making reduction on their imposts.

Mr. R. hoped to live to see the time, when the General Government would only net the five per cent. ad valorem duty, agreeably to the resolution of the Old Congress, but he would not agree to any reduction until he could see his way clear into the necessary expenses of Government. Mr.

R. said, we are told we should not repeal the internal taxes, because the rich pay them. The taxes on carriages and loaf sugar are given as instances. And we are urged to reduce the taxes on salt, brown sugar, bohea tea, and coffee, because the poor pay it.

Mr. R. had no difficulty in saying, he was in favor of repealing the internal taxes, to get clear of the perplexities of the excise system, and the expenses incurred in collecting the internal duties. These taxes were not paid by the rich. Domestic distilled spirits were used by the poor. A principal objection with him to the internal taxes, was the host of officers brought under Executive patronage, who take their tone from those on whom they depend, and are ready to disseminate through the country the principles held by the Executive. Gentlemen appeared desirous of retaining that rampart of protection the Executive has been raising around him. His object in repealing the excise, was as much to get clear of this host of officers as to be relieved from the taxes.

Mr. R. said, he would endeavor to get clear of this question in the way appointed for Legislative bodies to get clear of questions calculated to embarrass them, and would move the previous question.

Mr. DENNIS moved a postponement of the resolution, which he thought would supersede the previous question.

Some observations were made as to points of order.

Mr. GILES said, it was necessary certain rules should be had for the government of deliberative bodies ; the previous question was adopted to get clear of subjects prematurely brought before them ; this was its original intention. That was one of the questions this rule was calculated for. The only proper question, was the previous one.

Gentlemen have now placed themselves in the situation they blamed others for taking. They have reversed the situation of things as to the internal revenue. Instead of contrasting the taxes, it is proposed to reduce the impost on certain articles.

There was no cause for gentlemen to say they are treated with disrespect. There was an evident precipitation in the business, and when that was the case, it was not the proper time for gentlemen to give their sentiments on a subject.

Mr. RUTLEDGE then restored his resolution to its original form.

The previous question was called, and ayes and noes agreed to be taken.

Mr. GODDARD said, there were, daily, references made of petitions on various subjects, and therefore this resolution ought to be referred.

The constituents of some gentlemen think proper to petition Congress on particular subjects. The constituents of others depend upon their Representatives to bring their grievances before the Legislature, and in this way, shall a reference be refused ?

Mr. GILES wished the question had been taken directly, and was prepared to give it his negative. He should be now in favor of the previous question. He thought it improper to refer particular articles, when the committee had them generally before them.

Mr. G. said, ninety-nine hundredths of brown sugar were consumed by the rich, or by those in middling circumstances. This was the case with the taxes generally. There were not sufficient grounds for saying the poor were affected by these taxes.

Mr. ELMER spoke against the resolution. He thought the poor consumed very little of the articles mentioned; many of them were, for months together, without having any sugar in their houses. He was in favor of the previous question.

Mr. DENNIS said, he was prepared to vote against the previous question, and for the main question. He thought it very unusual to oppose the reference of such a resolution.

Mr. DANA considered it proper, when an abstract proposition was presented to the House, that it should be decided there, or in Committee of the Whole; but a resolution like the one before the House, even upon the principles of the gentlemen who oppose it, should be referred, as proposed, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SMITH agreed with his colleague in opinion, that it would be best to decide on the proposition directly. Early in the session, he proposed a resolution, that the external duties should be brought before the committee, and he mentioned, at that time, one of the articles (salt) which has occasioned so much debate since. It was his opinion, therefore, that the subject was already before the committee. He then read from the Journal the resolution he alluded to.

"Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to report whether any and what alterations are necessary in the laws imposing duties on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States."

"Resolved, That said resolution be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means."

Mr. SMITH said, it would unnecessarily swell the journals to refer specific resolutions on each article. When the committee make a general report, it will be in the power of each gentleman to move a reduction on any article he may think proper.

Mr. GRISWOLD considered the arguments used by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES,) respecting the previous question, went to show that the main question ought then to be put; he had also said he was prepared to give it his negative. Why, then, vote for the previous question?

Mr. RANDOLPH wished to withdraw the previous question.

The SPEAKER said, it required five members to agree in moving the previous question, and therefore it could not be withdrawn by one member.

Mr. BAYARD thought it clear that the main question should be then put. He had heard two arguments only used against it; one, that the resolution was already referred; but this was denied. He asked, would the committee fail in their duty if they did not report on this subject? Could you impeach them of disobedience? Let me appeal to the candor of gentlemen. Many wish it referred because they think it is not before the committee. Where, then, can be the harm of referring it? They agree that the committee should make the inquiry, but say it is already referred. We think not. What, then, can be the injury upon their own grounds, if it should be referred? It is a proposition allowed on all hands to be proper for the committee to take under consideration.

Gentlemen say, delay is our object in bringing it forward. They are the authors of the delay. If they had taken a more proper mode, and, give me leave to say, a wiser mode, it would have been avoided. Further delay may now be avoided by them. The debate has been provoked. To offer a resolution on every article would not delay an hour in the session. Nor could we produce delay if they did not oppose us. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) talks about swelling the journals by that mode. Is he afraid of increasing the labors of the Clerk, or making work for your printers? What motive can there be for us to increase expenses in this way?

The resolution is not to reduce the taxes on those articles, but to make inquiry on the subject. Three hundred and fifty thousand dollars may be dispensed with, besides the internal taxes. We wish the whole subject before the committee, for them to calculate the two species of taxation, internal and external, that they may decide which taxes would be most beneficial to the community to be reduced. Will gentlemen say that these internal taxes shall be reduced, even in opposition to public utility?

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) says, they create a host for Presidential patronage. We have no desire to send Executive influence over the country. These motives would influence me against these taxes. It is a great national object we have in view. If there should be any system of espionage in the tax on stills, this will not apply to the tax on loaf sugar, on carriages, &c. It has been said that it takes twenty per cent. on the aggregate amount of this tax to pay for collecting. But this is not the case with each particular item. On stamps it does not amount to six per cent., and if a number of these duties may be retained, and the expense of collection not exceed what is paid for collecting the impost, their great argument is invalidated. If the tax on necessities is more burdensome than on luxuries, which the excised articles are, will they pay the tax on imports if it should not be reduced?

Mr. NICHOLSON could not agree with the gentleman from Delaware as to the cause of delay. When the resolution was proposed, the question was called for, different gentlemen in favor of it continued to speak, although not opposed; it was not therefore his friends who occasioned the delay. He was opposed to referring the resolution, because the subject was already before the Committee. He hoped they would have the question.

Mr. GRISWOLD observed that every member who spoke on the subject said he was prepared to vote on the main question—that the Committee of Ways and Means should not be instructed to inquire into the propriety of reducing the tax on the articles mentioned in the resolution. The subject was important, and the attention of the committee should be called particularly to it. Under the general reference, the Committee of Ways and Means can only say it is expedient that the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to prepare a bill on imposts generally. A gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. SOUTHARD,) had said the carriage tax bore hard upon that State; that subject was referred to the committee. Another gentleman from the same State (Mr. ELMER,) said, sugar was not much used by the poor in his part of the country. Mr. G. said that it was very different where he was acquainted, for there they consumed great quantities of it.

Mr. DANA thought it important that this subject should be fairly met. As to swelling the Journal and increasing the expenses in that way, he was surprised to hear that objection made by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) who had proposed that Congress should adjourn for eight or ten days, which would have occasioned an expense to the nation of as many thousand dollars, and now he objects to the paltry, inconsiderable expense of swelling the journals. He was not for taking the bread from the mouth of the laborer. In his part of the country, the poor did consume the articles mentioned in the resolution. By poor, he did not mean beggars, but people who labored for their living; and he gloried that, in his part of the country, they could, and did use these articles.

Mr. D. said, if the public good required it, he would tax his constituents whether they agreed to it or not; but he would never agree to tax them severely, to gratify the whim of any part of the country.

Mr. DAVIS said, as it would no doubt be gratifying to the gentleman who had just sat down, he would answer him; he might otherwise think his arguments unanswerable. He believed the gentleman's constituents would have but little cause to thank him for his present attempts to serve them. The gentleman has been long in majorities, but never before made any attempt to serve them in this way. But when he is placed in the back-ground, when he has no longer any power to serve them, then forsooth he is very ready to do it. The gentlemen who are now so much in favor of repealing these taxes, when they were in a majority laid these taxes; and now, when in a minority, they call upon us to take them off. They say the state of the country is altered. True it is the state of the country is altered; we then pretended to fear a war from a nation surrounded by enemies, and so hedged in by enemies that they could not get at us. Then a quarrel was feared, and now we have a war actually on hand. The officers employed in collecting the internal taxes were too numerous to keep up that mode of taxation. It would be dangerous to take off the impost—as it was once said, What would be the effects of the general peace?

Mr. D. hoped the experience of that day would teach the majority to let the minority speak as they pleased on such questions, without making them any answer.

Mr. T. MORRIS said, the gentleman from Kentucky has given a new turn to the debate. He says the gentleman from Connecticut, while in a majority, taxed his constituents, and now calls on the present majority to take off these taxes. Mr. M. asked if that assertion was correct. If it was considered minutely, he thought it would not appear to be so. From whence did the call for reducing the taxes come? From the other side of the House. It came originally from the Executive. Was it fair then to say, the minority were attempting to take from the Government the means of supporting itself? Surely it was not so. It is a sentiment of the Executive and the Legislature to reduce the taxes. Should not an inquiry take place as to what taxes are the most proper to be reduced? Mr. M. thought it was due to his constituents to make the inquiry, in order to ascertain which should be repealed, and this liberty of thinking has called forth what we have just heard. He thought they were sent there to confer together about the public good. It was but fair to consider arguments, give them due weight, and meet them fairly. A proposition, when offered to that House, ought to be discussed.

Mr. DANA said, that he had voted for the taxes formerly, he was not ashamed to deny; when it was necessary these expenses should be augmented, he chose that his constituents should pay their part. Now, when the taxes are to be reduced, were they to be denied the privilege, not of lessening them, but of making inquiry on the subject? He did not ask it as a favor, but he claimed it as a right.

The gentleman from Kentucky had mistaken what he said in another particular; when he reminded the Committee that the taxes on the articles mentioned in the resolution were laid with a view to war prices, he did not mean we had war in this country, but there was a general war over the commercial world, and the man must be an ignoramus not to know that was his allusion.

The previous question was then put in these words—"Shall the main question be now put?" There were yeas 45, nays 49, as follow:

Mr. S. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, enclosing copies of the instructions heretofore given by the Department of the Navy, to the commanders of vessels in the public service, authorizing the capture of vessels belonging to the French Republic, in pursuance of a resolution of this House of the twenty-second instant; which were read and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of Lawrence Erb from his confinement;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, enclosing a copy of the instructions heretofore issued to the commanders of private armed vessels of the United States, from the Department of State, under the direction of the President, in virtue of an act of Congress, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce of the United States," transmitted in pursuance of a resolution of this House, of the twenty-second instant; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report on the petition of Joseph Ward, for himself and others, holders of certain bills of credit, referred to him by order of the House, on the eighth instant; which were read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Claims, of the twelfth instant, to whom was referred, on the fourteenth ultimo, the petition of Caleb Eddy, "with instruction to inquire into the expediency of extending to the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia, a further time for exhibiting their claims for lands under the "Act for the relief of the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia," which lay on the table; Whereupon, Ordered, That the report be committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

Mr. T. MORRIS called up the resolution he laid on the table on Friday last, viz:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House the amount of duties paid on stamps in each State, specifying what proportion was paid by the commercial cities."

The question being put, there were for it 34, against it 54—so it was not carried.

IMPORT DUTIES.

Mr. NICHOLSON called up the resolution he laid on the table on Friday, for instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to report generally on the subject of impost duties.

Mr. LOWNDES wished to amend it so as to direct the attention of that committee particularly to the article of salt, brown sugar, coffee, and Bohea tea.

This the SPEAKER considered out of order, as resolutions on those subjects were then before the House.

Mr. RUTLEDGE and Mr. BAYARD wished to withdraw the resolutions they had offered on the articles of salt, brown sugar, &c.

The SPEAKER considered the resolutions in possession of the House, as they had been debated, and the previous question taken on them, and no motion could be made while another motion was pending.

Mr. BAYARD asked for information whether it was in order for him to state that he withdrew in his resolution?

Some conversation took place as to points of order.

The question on the resolution was called for.

Mr. DANA said there was no instruction given to the committee by the resolution of December 13, to make a report on the subject of imposts and tonnage. He was pleased to see this resolution moved by the gentleman from Maryland, as it showed his belief to be that the subject was not referred to the committee.

Mr. DANA expressed his wish that two things should be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means: First, a general view of the duties of imposts and excise that they might be contrasted; and, secondly, that certain articles should be specifically referred to them.

Mr. NICHOLSON said the gentleman from Connecticut was very much mistaken as to the object of his resolution. It was not that he did not think the subject before the committee, but as so much had been said about the former general reference, he wished to prevent the gentleman from Connecticut from quibbling respecting the reference.

[Here Mr. N. was called to order by Mr. GRISWOLD. The SPEAKER declared it as his opinion that the gentleman was in order. Mr. BAYARD appealed to the House, and called the yeas and nays, which were agreed to be taken.]

Some gentlemen wished the words made use of by Mr. NICHOLSON to be stated, that the House might determine whether it was in order to make use of such expressions, but it was put in the usual mode. Mr. DANA and Mr. NICHOLSON were excused from voting.

The question, "Was the gentleman in order?" was then put, and carried in the affirmative—yeas 56, nays 30.

Mr. NICHOLSON's resolution was to the following effect:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the laws laying impost and tonnage duties, and report to this House."

It was put and carried.

INTERNAL REVENUES.

Mr. BAYARD called up the following resolution, which he had some days previously laid upon the table, viz:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be required to lay before this House an account, in detail, of the expenses incurred in the collection of the internal revenues of the United States; distinguishing, where the same may be practicable, the expenses attending the collection in each branch of the said revenue, and, also, an estimate of reduction of said expenses which may conveniently be made."

The resolution having been read, Mr. B. said: As it is extremely possible, Mr. Speaker, that it is designed that this resolution shall share the same fate with that which the resolution of the gentleman from New York experienced this morning, I shall be allowed at least by publicly stating, to justify to the world, the motive which induced me to bring it forward. [Mr. B. alluded to a resolution offered by Mr. T. MORRIS, the object of which was, to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to state to the House the amount of stamp duties collected in each State, distinguishing what part was paid by the commercial cities. When the resolution was taken up there was a call for the question. Nothing was said against the propriety of it. It being merely a call for information, and considered so much a matter of course to agree to such resolutions when no opposition was made to them, it was not supposed necessary to say any thing on the propriety and reasonableness of the resolution. Yet, to the astonishment of its friends, when the question was put, there were for it 34, against it 54.]

Gentlemen are infinitely deceived, said Mr. B., if they think our object is, by any particular mode of proceeding, to gain an unfair advantage of public opinion. If such a suspicion be entertained, our conduct has been viewed with a jaundiced eye. It is a motive which never has, and I hope never will direct our measures. If popularity is to be gained only by a prostitution of principle to ignorant and unthinking prejudice, we are content to forego it. I am far from being indifferent to public opinion; the approbation of our fellow-citizens is the only reward we can expect for our services; but it is a reward no honest man will seek, if it is to be acquired only by artifice and deception.

I have avowed and avowed sincerely, that I am disposed to go hand and hand with gentlemen in the reduction of public burdens. When it was necessary I assisted in imposing them—now that circumstances permit I more cheerfully co-operate in taking them off. My true object is to make the most of our situation; not to be deluded by empty theories, or speculative systems, but, by an enlarged view of the various interests of the country, to discover by the reduction of what taxes the society would be the most substantially benefited.

The reduction of the Military Establishment creates considerable savings; other retrenchments are contemplated in the Navy and civil administration. These savings enable us to dispense with certain taxes; but is it not wise to examine diligently the operation of the several taxes which exist, and, after being informed by the various views which belong to the subject, to exonerate the community from those which, with the least benefit, are the most burdensome?

One great objection to the internal taxes is the expense of collection. I wish to know the particulars of this expense, in order to see whether it may not be curtailed. I wish also to be informed of the expenses attending each branch of the revenue, for the purpose of judging whether it may not be expedient to retain some branches, while it may be wise to part with others. These are my objects; do they not entitle us to the information asked?

We know in one instance, that the expense in collecting the stamp duty is less than five per cent. This appears by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury; but we are not informed of the particular expenses belonging to the other branches of the revenue.

Do gentlemen mean to lock up the doors of the Executive offices, and deny the information those offices were designed to supply to this House? Are they afraid of the light which may be thrown on this subject. Are they afraid that it will be discovered that it is not the general good which they are pursuing, but local and private advantages? Can information injure us? If the project contemplated is a correct one, will it not be promoted rather than obstructed by the information called for? For my own part, said Mr. B., I want this information, in order to discover the course which it is my duty to pursue. I do not feel myself committed as to any particular plan.

If it should really be found, that it is better to tax articles of necessary consumption than those of mere luxury, that a tax on carriages is more oppressive than a tax on salt or brown sugar, I should certainly yield to the conviction, however unexpectedly it might assail me.

Sir, said Mr. B., I must rely that the resolution will be agreed to; there is not a precedent in our annals of opposition to such a resolution; if, however, one is now to be introduced, I think it proper that the names of those gentlemen should hereafter appear by whom it was resisted, and by whom Internal Revenues.

it was established. He therefore hoped the question would be taken by yeas and nays.

The Clerk, at the request of Mr. RANDOLPH, read an extract from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, as follows:

"It will appear by the same statement, [M.] that while the expenses of collection on merchandise and tonnage, which are defrayed out of the revenue, do not exceed four per cent., those on permanent internal duties amount to almost twenty per cent. This, however, is an inconvenience which, on account of the great number of the individuals on whom the duties are raised, and of their dispersed situation throughout the whole extent of the United States, must, more or less, attach to the system of internal taxation so long as the wants of Government shall not require any considerable extension, and the total amount of revenue shall remain inconsiderable."

Mr. T. MORRIS.—If the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) thinks that the extract of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the reading of which he has called for, furnishes the information demanded by my honorable friend from Delaware, he is mistaken. The Secretary's report gives you a general estimate of the expense of collecting the aggregate of the internal taxes, but does not specify the charge falling on each separate tax. From the statement exhibited by the Secretary, it appears that it costs twenty per cent. to collect the whole of the internal taxes; but if the detailed statement asked for by the gentleman from Delaware is furnished, it will appear that the collection of some of those taxes does not cost more than five or six per cent. To show how unfair it is to connect together the expense attending the collection of all the internal taxes, I need only refer gentlemen to an authority which I believe they will not dispute. If my memory, sir, is not very incorrect, it will appear by a publication of the present Secretary of the Treasury, written in the year 1796, that the tax on country distilleries cost in its collection near thirty per cent.; that on city distilleries about nineteen. These, sir, and other reasons, may evince the propriety of repealing the tax on country distilleries; but because this tax is expensive in its collection, because it may be liable to objections, does it follow that other taxes, such as the tax on carriages, on refined sugars, &c., which fall on the rich, and which are not expensive in the collection, does it follow, I say, that because it may be proper to repeal the first, that these are to fall too? It is, sir, in order to be enabled to make proper discrimination, to be enabled to know which of these taxes ought to be repealed, and which retained, that the gentleman from Delaware has moved his resolution. And here, sir, let me be permitted to express a hope, that the resolution now before you may not meet with the silent negative which was the fate of one intended also to procure information, and which I had the honor of laying on your table. I did and do still believe, sir, that the majority of this House could not have been actuated by proper motives in refusing that information. [Here Mr. RANDOLPH called Mr. MORRIS to order, saying that he had no right to impeach the motives of members. Mr. M. observed that for his part he was at a loss to know what was considered disorderly in that House, but that he would submit to the correction of the Chair. The Speaker determined him to be in order, and Mr. M. proceeded.] With regard, sir, to the course of proceeding which gentlemen have lately adopted, persevering in an inflexible silence, rejecting every proposition made by a member in the minority, without deigning to show its fallacy, refusing public documents for our information and that of our fellow-citizens, without showing, or even pretending to show, that they are unnecessary, I can only say that it militates against all my ideas of propriety. I have always hitherto supposed that every Representative on this floor had a right to be heard; that he had a right to call on the majority for their reasons both when they supported and opposed public measures. Gentlemen may, if they please, meet in what they have denominated caucusses when power was in other hands; they may then confer together about the measures in which they may think proper to unite; but, sir, if their debates are to take place there, and there alone, if we are not to be furnished here by them with the reasons which induce them to adopt public measures, they ought at least to open their doors to the minority, in order that, if they cannot hear their arguments in the proper place, they may not close them altogether. I trust, sir, that gentlemen themselves will see the impropriety of persevering in this line of conduct, and that they will consent to pay, if not to gentlemen in the minority, at least to their propositions, the attention and respect which they may deserve.

Mr. GRISWOLD said, that he presumed the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) had requested that the extract from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury might be read, and which the House had just heard, for the purpose of proving that the resolution under consideration ought to pass. Indeed that report, and the statement to which it referred, evinced in the most satisfactory manner that the information required by the resolution was absolutely necessary for the purpose of enabling the House to decide understandingly on the proposition, which it was expected would soon be brought forward, for abolishing the internal taxes. The Secretary in his report had declared that the expense of collecting the internal taxes amounted nearly to twenty per cent. on the amount collected. It appeared, however, from the statements to which the Secretary had alluded, that the tax on stills, the carriage tax, the tax on licenses, on sales at auction, and the tax on refined sugar, had been included in one class, and the expense of collecting all those taxes, without distinguishing the charges on each branch, had been stated to be nearly twenty per cent., whilst the expense of collecting the stamp duty, another branch of the internal taxes, was short of five per cent., varying only a fraction from the charges on the revenue from impost and tonnage. These statements might be satisfactory as far as they went, but it was obvious that in examining the branches of a revenue, with a view to the expense of collection, it became necessary to ascertain the precise charge which had fallen on each branch, and to obtain this necessary information, and which the report and statements had left defective, the resolution had been principally brought forward. And what had rendered this information peculiarly necessary at this time was the ground which had been taken in opposition to the internal taxes. The only argument which he had heard against those taxes, and which did not equally apply to the impost, was drawn from the great expense which had arisen in the collection. To enable the House, therefore, to decide whether the fact existed on which that argument had been founded, it became necessary to inquire in the manner proposed by the resolution whether the extraordinary expense with which those taxes had been charged might not be diminished, and whether the expense really existed in relation to each description of them.

Mr. G. said that he presumed no gentleman was prepared to say that the general expense of collection might not be diminished, and so far was he from believing that every branch of the internal taxes was subjected to the charge of nineteen or twenty per cent., he was perfectly confident that if gentlemen would agree to the resolution, the detailed statements, which the Secretary would furnish in obedience to it, would prove that the expense of collecting certain branches of those taxes would fall much short of the sum at which the same has been estimated.

The consent of the House, said Mr. G., to every call for information, had formerly been so much a matter of course, that he should not have troubled the House with any remarks upon so plain a question as the present, had not the experience of this day proved, that gentlemen were not always to be indulged by the House with the information which they required; and the profound silence which had at this time been observed by those gentlemen who could either admit or reject the resolution, appeared to indicate a determination on their part to refuse the important and necessary information required by the resolution. He did presume, however, that upon this occasion the House would consent to the resolution, and more particularly, as the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which had been read at the request of the gentleman from Virginia, proved so clearly the necessity of passing it.

Mr. HUGAR could not reconcile it with his sense of duty, to give a silent vote on the present occasion, nor could he but lament the strange and novel course of proceeding which gentlemen had thought proper to adopt. The intention it would seem, was to repeal the internal taxes, right or wrong, and at all events; and so determined were gentlemen on carrying this favorite project into execution, that everything like previous investigation, or even a wish to gain information on the subject, was hooted at and treated with the most sovereign contempt. Every, the smallest, reduction on taxes of any other description, was avowedly to be excluded, nor was any proposition to this effect deemed worthy of even a moment's consideration. The measure proposed, however, interested in a very particular manner that part of the community he had the honor to represent. They paid, it was true, a small portion of the internal taxes, but the various other taxes upon salt, brown sugar, coffee, &c., and the duties on imposts generally, fell more immediately and far more heavily on them. Was it not natural, therefore, that he should have some hesitation on the subject; that he should feel anxious to see this project thoroughly and completely investigated; that he should wish to receive every possible information which might either tend to satisfy his mind as to the expediency of repealing the internal taxes only, to the total exclusion of all others, or enable him to propose some other project, equally beneficial perhaps to the public at large, and which might at the same time accord better with the immediate interests of his constituents?

That peace had been restored to the country, and the moment consequently approached when that House might hope to diminish the burdens of their constituents, could not but afford infinite satisfaction to every gentleman present. He rejoiced most sincerely at the pleasing prospect, and felt much gratification in the idea of contributing with others to afford this relief to the community. He had not, indeed, any very particular hostility to the repeal of any items of the internal taxes which might be found oppressive or inconvenient to any portion of his fellow-citizens; nor would he object even to the exclusive repeal of the whole of them, if, upon due consideration, it appeared that by so doing, such peculiar and important advantages would accrue to the great family of America, as would, upon an enlarged and national view of the subject, compensate his constituents for the greater quantum of public burdens, which would thereby be entailed on them. When fortunately, however, the state of things seemed to admit a diminution of the public burdens, he did conceive that every portion of the country was equally entitled to the attention of the Legislature, and that the reductions should, if possible, be effected in such manner as to extend an equal and proportionate relief to every description of citizens—as well those who were scattered along the shores of the Atlantic, as those who inhabited the interior of the country, or had emigrated beyond the mountains. The House would recollect how much warmth—notwithstanding the previous determination to silence—had been in the course of a former debate evinced by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. DAVIS.) He could not tolerate a doubt as to the propriety of a total repeal of these taxes. The reason of this was very evident. This description of tax was that by which his constituents principally contributed to the exigencies of the Government. To that gentleman, of course, everything militating against or tending to delay for a moment the success of this favorite project, was highly objectionable, and would excite all his sensibility. And was it not, Mr. H. asked, to be expected that he, too, should feel some little anxiety at the idea of this relief being extended to a favored portion of the community, whilst those he had the honor to represent were left to struggle under the weight of all those burdens which bore most hard and most immediately on them? His constituents, he was proud to say it, had ever contributed with alacrity and cheerfulness to the wants and exigencies of the Union. They were prepared and willing, he was confident, to do so still; and he made not the least doubt but that they would readily subscribe to the exclusive repeal of the internal taxes, and submit without a murmur, to the continuation of all the other taxes, however burdensome to themselves, provided they are convinced and well satisfied that this measure was fairly and impartially adopted for the welfare of the whole, and not for the benefit of the one at the expense of the other division of the country. It was for this purpose, therefore, that he wished the present motion to be adopted, and that he had desired the attention of the Committee of Ways and Means to be directed particularly to those articles of importation and of general use and necessity, such as salt, sugar, coffee, common teas, &c. He was desirous that these and similar items should be compared with the carriage tax, the tax on licenses to retail spirituous liquors, and various other similar items of the internal taxes, and that the House might be furnished with such information with respect to both, as might enable him to judge, whether there might not be a partial repeal as well of some of the external as internal taxes, and not a total and exclusive reduction of the latter, as was contemplated; whilst all the former, however grievous and inconvenient, were to be retained. Did he then ask anything which was unreasonable or improper? Could any possible inconvenience accrue from allowing him to obtain the information he desired? If not, why refuse to indulge him in what he deemed useful, and what (at the worst) could only be regarded by gentlemen themselves as superfluous information? Was it fair; was it becoming; did it comport with that civility and politeness which was due from the one to the other, by citizens of a common country, assembled together for the express purpose of consulting upon their common interests, to treat thus cavalierly what must at least be allowed to be a respectable minority?

Internal Revenues.

When on his return home, he was asked by his constituents, how it happened that the burdens on their brethren of the interior country had been entirely taken off, and that not the smallest relief had been extended to them, what answer was he to give them? The President, he must say, had hinted something of the kind in his message to the two Houses, at the commencement of the session, and the Secretary of the Treasury had casually observed in one of his reports, that the internal tax required more officers and greater expense to collect it than the duties on imports. For himself, he certainly had all due deference for these two officers. He felt personally very great respect for the gentleman who at this time filled the office of Chief Magistrate of the United States. He held also in high estimation the talents of the Secretary of the Treasury, but notwithstanding what had fallen from these two gentlemen, his mind was not convinced, nor did he think these were documents sufficient to satisfy the minds of that portion of our fellow-citizens who, from the appearance of things at least, might conceive that their interests had not been sufficiently attended to, and that in the reduction of the taxes now existing, justice had not been dealt out with an impartial and equal hand. Will not this impression be rendered still more strong, when the citizens in this situation learn that even the information requested from the public departments by those to whom they judged proper to entrust their interests, had been denied them, without one solitary reason being given for the refusal? When they are further told, that the various references which were attempted to be made in different shapes, or for an inquiry as to the propriety and possibility of effecting a partial repeal of the most burdensome external as well as internal taxes, were again and again rejected?

With respect to the two only reasons which had ever been offered in favor of the exclusive repeal of the internal tax, viz: the expense and number of officers required to collect it, was it not the immediate and precise object of the resolution under debate to inquire whether it was not possible to devise some means by which these inconveniences might be obviated, or at least greatly lessened? And what objection could there be to the inquiry? Were gentlemen perfectly and entirely convinced that nothing of the kind could be done, or were they apprehensive that the thing was in itself so feasible, that an inquiry of this kind would throw a stumbling-block in the way of the project already determined on, which although he would freely acknowledge, that as an abstract proposition it was expedient as much as possible, and to collect your taxes at as small an expense, and by means of as few agents as conveniently could be done, yet there was another still more important maxim which ought never to be lost sight of: this was, that the burdens of the Government, as well as the advantages which flowed from it, should be fairly, equally, impartially, and equitably distributed among every description of the citizens, in whatever part of the country they resided. If, therefore, it did happen, that a few more officers and a somewhat greater percentage were required to collect the taxes in one than in another part of the country, this alone would most certainly and indubitably not be a sufficient reason to do away all the taxes in the one, and throw the whole burden of the Government on the inhabitants of the other.

Mr. H. concluded by observing that he had endeavored to consider this whole business as coolly and with as much temper as was in his power—that he could not, however, but again express his regret at the line of conduct adopted by gentlemen, and that, as he could not see, nor had there been pointed out, any possible inconvenience which could accrue from adopting the resolution, he really thought the wishes of himself and those who thought with him on the present occasion, for information, ought, in fairness and candor, to be gratified—supposing even that the information requested did not appear equally important and necessary to those who differed with them in opinion.

Mr. RUTLEDGE confessed himself much puzzled by the new forms of proceeding this day adopted. Ever since he had had the honor of a seat in Congress, it had been invariably the practice, when measures were proposed not agreeable to the majority, for them to offer their objections to them. This had ever been the practice, and the experience of its convenience offered strong reasons for its continuance. When the majority stated their objections to any measure, the minority in sustaining it answered them fully: thus, both sides acted understandingly, and when the proceedings of the National Legislature went out to the people, they were at the same time informed of the reasons under which their Representatives had legislated. This had not only been the usage in Congress, but the form of proceeding in all representative bodies with whose history we are acquainted. Even in the British House of Commons, which gentlemen had often and emphatically styled a mockery of representation, so great is the respect paid to public opinion, that the majority deem it their duty to assign in debate the reasons of their conduct. Although the Minister in England has quite as much confidence in the strength of his majority as gentlemen here can have in theirs, yet, in feeling power, he does not forget right, and his regard for public opinion is so great, that he never secures his measures by a silent vote. In these days of innovation, we, it seems, are to pursue a different course. When the resolution offered this morning by his honorable friend from New York (Mr. MORRIS) was taken into consideration, not a voice was raised against it. This profound silence made us expect a unanimous vote; but, in consequence, he supposed, of some out-door arrangements, it was rejected by this silent majority. He had seen many deliberative assemblies, but never before witnessed such a procedure. He would not say whether this was respectful towards the minority, who, we have been told from high authority, have their equal rights—he would not say whether it was dignified as it regarded the majority, but, without pretending to any spirit of prophecy, he would venture to say it could not be deemed politic or wise by the people of this country.

When the doors of Congress were open, and persons admitted to take the debates, the people expected to be fully informed of the views and motives which governed the votes of their Representatives. But it seems our constituents are not to be treated with this heretofore common civility. In proposing measures we are obliged to guess at what gentlemen feel against them, (for they say nothing,) and to defend them, without knowing in what they are objectionable to those who govern in this House. This kind of governing is but ill calculated to produce harmony, to restore social intercourse, and to heal the wounds inflicted on society by the spirit of party.

His friend from Delaware, not satisfied with the report made by the Secretary of the Treasury respecting the expense of collecting the internal revenues, begs that we may have a further report, and one more in detail, and declares that we really want more information to assist us in forming our opinions. But gentlemen refuse this reasonable request. They may have sufficient information; they may be in habits of intimacy with the heads of departments; in daily communion with them; but we are not, and should act with impertinence, were we, by our personal applications, to occupy the time of the heads of departments, which is fully engaged during the sitting of the Legislature.

The regular mode of obtaining information is, for the House to ask for it. When heretofore in a majority, he and his friends had always consented to call upon the heads of departments for any information the minority said they wanted; he should continue to vote for asking whenever any gentleman said he wanted it—though probably he should not be thanked for it, as gentlemen on the other side were now so strong as not to want his vote. A bill had lately been introduced for the protection of our Mediterranean trade, and the gentleman on my right, from Virginia, with his friends, wanted information from the Secretary of the Treasury respecting the extent and value of this trade—to know whether it was worth protecting. I voted for the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, because he said he wanted information. I did not want any, for the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury for some years past had showed the amount of the trade; besides, I deemed it our duty, this nation being highly commercial, to protect our trade in all its branches. Gentlemen on the other side seem to shrink from all our propositions, lest they should interfere with the favorite project of annihilating all our internal revenues. There is no cause for this apprehension. The President's Message invites to this measure, and the friends of the recommendations of the Executive are too numerous to have their measures obstructed by our efforts. All we ask for is information relative to the expense of collecting this part of the public income. Gentlemen say we shall not have it, and yet, on all past occasions, they talked about the propriety, in a popular Government, of giving information to the public, of not economising in diffusing information—they who now refuse information which is solicited by a large portion of the Representatives of the people. Gentlemen not only withhold information from us, but will not assign their reasons for withholding it; and to all, we urge they will not deign to say anything but No.

Mr. BAYARD.—I thank God, if we have not the advantage of hearing gentlemen on the other side express their opinions, we have still the liberty of expressing our own sentiments. Not knowing how long we may have that liberty, I will now state further my opinion on the subject before the House.

The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) without condescending to speak himself, has deigned to ask the Clerk to read—what! an extract from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the aggregate expense attending the collection of the internal revenue to be about twenty per centum. But is this an answer to my inquiry, when I want particular information that shall discriminate the expense of collecting the different branches of this revenue?

Import Duties.

I have another object in view. I wish to know whether the Secretary of the Treasury may not devise a plan by which these taxes may be collected on as good terms as on articles of impost.

When information has been called for heretofore, has it ever been denied? Have gentlemen a precedent for their conduct? Is there an instance at any epoch when the strength of a silent vote opposed information that was wanted? Will this information thwart the favorite views of some? Are gentlemen afraid of information, lest they could not carry a favorite project when it should appear to be opposed to the public benefit? Are they afraid to let information come here lest it should go out to the people?

If the information we want is refused, without any reasons being assigned, I do not see what business we have to do here. Do gentlemen mean to drive us from this floor? Are they ready to say our services are no longer wanted? If it is enough for us to ask a thing to be denied; if whatever we propose is rejected; if no answer is given to our arguments; if we are listened to only to indulge the laugh of insolent power, I think the sooner we go home the better. We shall at least save the money of the nation. And I am satisfied, if this conduct be pursued, we shall not only be justified, but it will be expected by the nation that we no longer keep our seats, which are not merely useless but burdensome to the country.

Mr. GODDARD said, that he had until this time consoled himself with an idea, that whatever measures might be adopted the present session, he and those with whom he acted would at least have been permitted to understand the principles upon which those measures would be supported. This consolation he had derived from a declaration, made at an early period of the session, by an honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES,) that economy of information was not what he wished to be practised. But of that solitary consolation, he had this day been bereft. We have already made such advances in the system of economy, as to have arrived at a point where it is thought necessary to practise economy of information. He inferred this, from the manner in which the resolutions which had been called up, had been treated. Several motions had been made, to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of reducing the duties upon certain imported articles, necessities of life; they had been uniformly repelled. Gentlemen wished, when the flourishing condition of our finances enabled us to reduce taxes, to take a view of the whole ground—to compare, with each other, the system of internal and external taxation.

To enable us to do this, a resolution had been offered, the object of which was to obtain, from the proper department, information necessary to this purpose:—that also had been repelled. Another resolution is now offered, which has in view the same object, relating to another subject. Gentlemen seem determined to dispose of that also, in the same manner, by a silent vote.

Mr. G. said that he could not be persuaded but that gentlemen would candidly review the course they had adopted, and yet suffer us to have, from the public offices, the information necessary to enable us to act correctly upon the business before us.

The question was taken, and it passed in the negative—yeas 37, nays 57, as follows:

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. RUTLEDGE called up for consideration the resolution which he moved on Friday, on which the previous question was then taken, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed particularly to inquire into the expediency of reducing the duties on brown sugar, coffee, and bohea tea."

Mr. GRISWOLD hoped the resolution would be decided upon.

Mr. RUTLEDGE hoped the reference would obtain. These articles paid the highest rate of duties and were of the first necessity. In looking over the rates of duties on imports, he saw many articles that were taxed enormously high. Those in the resolution were of the first necessity, the duty high, and laid when they were at war prices: while the people received war prices for their produce, they could with convenience pay for these articles, though high. The object of the resolution was merely to inquire, and he did not see how it could interfere with any object gentlemen have in view.

Mr. DANA.—I beg liberty to tender the homage of my profound respects, for the dignified situation in which gentlemen have now placed themselves, and congratulate them on their silence. There is something peculiarly impressive in this mode of opposing everything that is urged. It is seldom that gentlemen have exhibited such a remarkable appearance of a philosophical assembly.

"That dumb Legislature will immortalize your name"—is said to have been the language of a certain distinguished General to a certain nominal Abbé, who has been represented as having pigeon-holes full of constitutions of his own making. During the memorable night at St. Cloud, when the French Council of Ancients, and Council of Five Hundred, were adjourned—to meet no more—it may be recollected, the powers of executive government were provisionally committed to three persons, styled Consuls, and two of them were the General and the Abbé. From each of the Councils, twenty-five members were selected, to compose a commission, and assist the provisional Consuls in preparing a constitution for France. Of the numerous projects of constitutions presented by the Abbé, it is said no part was finally adopted, except the plan of a dumb Legislature. This, the General instantly seized, with apparent enthusiasm, exclaiming to the Abbé, "that dumb Legislature will immortalize your name!" And it was determined to have a corps législatif that should vote, but not debate.

It was scarcely to be expected that anything like this would soon take place in our own country. But it is the prerogative of great geniuses, when in similar circumstances, to arrive at the same great results, although with some difference in the process. Nor can I forbear offering my tribute of admiration for the genius who has projected a mode of proceeding among us, that so nearly rivals the plan adopted in France. I know not to whom is due the honor of this luminous discovery. After ascribing to him, however, all merited glory, permit me to examine the force of the argument relied on by gentlemen in opposition to the proposed resolution.

Their argument is silence. I hope to be excused if I do not discuss this subject in the most satisfactory manner; as silence is a new species of logic, about which no directions have been found in any treatise on logic that I have ever seen. It will be my endeavor to reply to gentlemen by examining some points which may be considered as involved in their dumb arguments.

One of these points is—that certain members of this House have pledged themselves to their constituents, for repealing all the internal taxes. They may have declared their opinions to this effect, before the election; and, being chosen under such circumstances, may now deem themselves bound in honor not to vary. The terms assented to between their constituents and themselves may, therefore, be viewed by them as the particular rule of their own conduct. But is this House to be regarded in the same light with the English House of Commons, during the early period of their history, when the knights of shires, and the representatives of cities and boroughs, were instructed on what terms they should bargain with the Crown for special privileges, and were limited to the price agreed on by their constituents? The situation of gentlemen who have thus pledged themselves to vote for repealing the internal taxes, must be irksome, indeed, if on mature consideration they should believe it more proper and more beneficial for the country to have other taxes reduced. Those who have entered into a stipulation of this sort, so as to feel it as a point of honor, are so peculiarly circumstanced that they might think it too assuming in me, were I so much as to express a desire that they would vote for reducing some of the duties on imports, instead of repealing all the internal taxes. It is to be hoped, the number of members who have pledged themselves in this manner, does not exceed twenty-five or thirty.

Another point involved in this argument of silence is, that other gentlemen may have pledged themselves to these, and given them a promise of support on this subject. It must be acknowledged that this was more than was required on account of their seat in this House. If any gentlemen have absolutely so pledged themselves to others who had before pledged themselves to their constituents, it must indeed be difficult to convince them. On this point, their minds must be so differently constituted from mine, that there does not seem to be any common principle between us that can be assumed as the basis of argumentation.

Another point is, the Executive has recommended a repeal of all the internal taxes, and not any reduction of the impost. And will gentlemen act upon this as a sufficient reason for their conduct? Is it now to become a principle, that the Executive is to deliberate, and the Legislature to act, and that no measure is to be adopted unless proposed by the Executive? Would it not be better for the country to abolish this House, and to avoid useless expense, if it is to be nothing more than one of the ancient Parliaments of France, employed to register the edicts of a master?

The silence of the gentlemen may also be considered as having relation to their great desire for the harmony of social intercourse. To prevent its being disturbed in the House by debating, they may have come to a determination that all the great questions shall be settled by gentlemen of a certain description, when met in nocturnal conclave, and be only voted upon in this place. If such be the fact, it seems but reasonable that any of the members of this House should be admitted in meetings of the conclave, as delegates from the territorial districts are admitted into Congress, with a right to debate, although not to vote. If, however, this is thought too much, gentlemen should at least have galleries provided, so that other members of the Legislature might be admitted as spectators, and have the opportunity of knowing the reasons for public measures.

The question was called for, when Mr. EUSTIS begged the Speaker would state it, as, in listening to the arguments of the gentleman from Connecticut, he had forgotten it.

Duty on Salt.

H. OF R.

Mr. RUTLEDGE said he was much pleased by the question of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts. When gentlemen ask, What is the question? it is to be hoped that they will respect its merits; but, from the scene this day acted, he had learned that the only inquiry with gentlemen would be, from what side does this come?

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, and lost—yeas 35, nays 58, as follows:

DUTY ON SALT.

The House then proceeded to the further consideration of a motion on which the previous question was called for and taken on the twelfth instant; and the said motion being amended to read as follows:

“Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed, particularly, to inquire into the expediency of reducing the duty on salt; and, also, the duties on articles of necessary consumption, and more especially the duties oppressive to the agricultural and mechanical interests of the community.”

The main question was taken that the House do agree to the said motion, as amended, and passed in the negative—yeas 32, nays 57, as follows:

And the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 26.

Memorials of sundry inhabitants of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, purchasers and settlers on the lands originally contracted for by John Cleves Symmes, between the Great and Little Miami rivers, were presented to the House and read, respectively praying that Congress will extend the time for the payments to be made by the memorialists, on account of the contract between the United States and the said John Cleves Symmes, and his associates, for the reasons therein specified; or grant such relief in the premises, as to their wisdom shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said memorials be referred to the committee appointed, on the eighth ultimo, to whom was referred the petition of James McCashen and others; and to whom was also referred, on the eighteenth instant, the memorial of John Cleves Symmes.

The House, resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on an act of the Legislature of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, entitled “An act declaring the assent of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, to an alteration in the ordinance for the government thereof;” to which Committee of the whole House were also referred, on the twentieth and twenty-fifth instant, the petitions of sundry inhabitants of the said Territory, in opposition to the recited act; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

An engrossed bill to continue in force an act, passed on the first day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, entitled “An act supplementary to the act, entitled ‘An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes,’ was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred, on the eighth instant, the petition of sundry merchants of the city of Philadelphia, made a report; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House as follows:

to whom was referred the petition of Daniel W. Coxe and others, merchants of Philadelphia, report :

"That the petitioners state that they are deprived of the drawbacks on goods of foreign growth and manufacture, and on salted provisions, shipped by them from the port of Philadelphia to ports of foreign nations, although they had complied with every requisite required by law for the obtaining of such drawbacks, save only the taking of the oaths within the ten days prescribed by law, to wit : 'That the goods were truly intended to be exported, and were not intended to be re-landed within the United States;' and the giving bond that the said goods, or any part thereof, should not be landed within the United States.

"The petitioners further state, that they appeared at the custom-house within a very few days after the ten days (prescribed by law) had expired, and offered to take the said oaths, and to give the bond required by law; when, to their surprise, the Collector informed them that it was no longer in his power to afford them relief: They, therefore, solicit Congress to authorize the Collector for the port of Philadelphia to issue the debentures due to them respectively.

"The committee are of opinion that the prayer of the petitioners ought to be granted, and submit a bill to that effect."

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the same committee, presented a bill for the relief of Daniel W. Coxe and others; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

Mr. SPRIGG reported a bill for the government of the Territory of Columbia.

[The bill establishes a Legislature, chosen by the taxable citizens of the United States one year resident in the Territory, composed of a House of Representatives, to consist of twenty-five members, seven whereof to be chosen by the district of Rock Creek, seven from the part west of Rock Creek, and eleven by the county of Alexandria. The Governor to be appointed by the President of the United States. The Territory to pay the Legislature, and the United States the Governor. The judges to hold their offices during life, unless removed by the President on the application of two successive Legislatures.]

Referred to the Committee of the whole House on Tuesday next.

A memorial and remonstrance of sundry inhabitants of the county and town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will not agree to any plan, or pass any bill respecting the government of the said District, which shall, by the establishment of a subordinate Legislative or subordinate Executive, or otherwise, tend to unite under its power, the two parts of the district, as separated by the river Potomac.—Referred to the Committee of the whole House last appointed.

Ordered, That the letters of the Secretary of the Department of the Navy and of State, enclosing copies of instructions heretofore issued from the said Departments, under the direction of the President, to commanders of armed ships and vessels of the United States, in virtue of an act of Congress, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce of the United States," which were received, read, and ordered to lie on the table, on the twenty-fifth instant, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill to authorize the settlement of the account of Samuel Dexter, for his expense in defending against the suit of Joseph Hodgson; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the situation of the several tracts and parcels of land which have been granted, appropriated, or reserved, for the support of public schools and seminaries of learning, and for the support of religion, within the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio; and that the committee take into their consideration what measures are necessary, and ought to be adopted, to carry fully into effect the design of every such grant, appropriation, or reservation.

Ordered, That Mr. FEARING, M. DAVIS, Mr. GRAY, Mr. ROBERT WILLIAMS, and Mr. FOSTER, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the said committee be authorized to report by bill, or bills, or otherwise.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the committee appointed, on the fifteenth ultimo, presented a bill for revising and amending the acts concerning naturalization; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, of the fifteenth instant, to whom was referred the memorial of Thomas K. Jones; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported to the House their disagreement to the resolution contained therein; which is in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That the Collector for the port of Boston and Charlestown be, and he hereby is, authorized to issue to Thomas K. Jones the debentures on ten pipes of wine, imported by said Jones, in the ship Juno, Captain Thomas Dingley, and exported, on the fifteenth of June, last, in the ship Enterprize, Captain Hearsy, for Havana, on full and satisfactory proof being made to the said Collector of the actual quantity of wine in the said pipes at the time of their being shipped, as aforesaid: Provided, that every other requisite shall have been pursued, agreeably to law, for the obtaining the said drawback."

On the question to agree with the Committee of the whole House in their disagreement to the said resolution, an adjournment was called for; whereupon, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 27.

ation of the said bill was postponed until Monday next.

Petitions of sundry inhabitants of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, whose names are thereunto respectively subscribed, to the same effect with the petitions of sundry other inhabitants of the said Territory, presented on the twentieth instant, were presented to the House and read.—Referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom is committed an act of the Legislature of the said Territory, entitled “An act declaring the assent of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to an alteration in the ordinance for the government thereof.”

A memorial of the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, signed by Thomas Fitzsimons, their President, was presented to the House and read, praying that a law may be passed by Congress to authorize an appropriation for the expenses of supporting, and keeping in repair, certain piers heretofore erected in different places in the river Delaware, for the protection of vessels, in inclement seasons, navigating the said river.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. JONES, from the committee appointed on the fourteenth instant, presented a bill authorizing the payment of two thousand and eight hundred dollars to Philip Sloan; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. JOHN C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the thirteenth instant, the petition of John Carr, and two reports of committees thereon, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting the accounts of Indian trading houses, as rendered up to the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and one, with a report of the Secretary of War thereon, explaining the effects and the situation of that commerce, and the reasons in favor of its further extension. The Message and the documents accompanying the same were read, and ordered to be referred to the committee appointed, on the seventh instant, to whom was referred the memorial of Evan Thomas and others.

Ordered, That the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, of the fifteenth instant, on the memorial of Thomas K. Jones, to which the Committee of the whole House reported their disagreement on the twenty-sixth instant, be recommitted to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

NORTHWEST TERRITORY

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on an act of the Legislature of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, entitled “An act declaring the assent of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to an alteration in the ordinance for the government thereof;” to which Committee of the whole House were also referred the petitions of sundry inhabitants of the said Territory in opposition thereto: Whereon a debate of some length ensued, on the motion of Mr. FEARING, deciding the constitutionality of the act, which was supported by Messrs. FEARING, and GRISWOLD; and opposed by Messrs. DAVIS, GILES, and BAYARD. On the question being taken, it was lost. Mr. GILES’s motion, verbally modified, was then agreed to; when Mr. JOHN C. SMITH, the Chairman, reported that the Committee had come to the following resolution:

Resolved, As the opinion of this committee, that the act passed by the Legislature for the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, entitled “An act declaring the assent of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to an alteration in the ordinance for the government thereof,” ought not to be assented to by Congress.

The House then proceeded to consider the said resolution, and the same being again read, the question was taken, that the House do concur with the Committee of the whole House in their agreement to the said resolution, and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 81, nays 5, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, John Archer, John Bacon, James A. Bayard, Phanuel Bishop, Richard Brent, Robert Brown, William Butler, Samuel J. THURSDAY, January 28.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled “An act authorizing the discharge of Lawrence Erb from his confinement; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled “An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage;”

and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported several amendments thereto; which were severally read twice, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. SPRIGG, from the committee appointed on the eighth ultimo, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations or amendments may be necessary in the existing government and laws of the District of Columbia, to whom was referred, on the 11th instant, the memorial of Samuel Harvey Howard, register of the court of chancery in the State of Maryland, made a report; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That it is expedient to pass a law authorizing and directing the Marshal for the District of Columbia to collect, by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the debtors, or by execution against their persons, all fees due from residents in the said territory, which have become due, or may become due, to the solicitors, attorneys, registers, clerks, and other officers of any courts in Maryland, on any suits, process, or proceedings, pending in the said courts on the twenty-seventh day of February, one thousand eight hundred and one.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. SPRIGG, Mr. BRENT, Mr. FOSTER, Mr. GREGG, Mr. PLATER, Mr. STRATTON, and Mr. BACON, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the committee appointed on the seventh instant, to inquire and report whether any, and, if any, what, amendments are necessary in the laws respecting the fortifications of the harbors of the United States, made a report; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That no amendments in the laws aforesaid are necessary.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of a select committee of the nineteenth instant, on the resolutions of the Senate, in the form of joint resolutions of the two Houses, "in respect to Lieutenant Sterret, the officers, and crew of the United States' schooner Enterprize;" to which Committee of the whole House were also referred the said resolutions of the Senate; and, after some time spent therein, the Speaker resumed the Chair, and Mr. DAVIS reported that the Committee had had the said report and resolutions under consideration, and directed him to repeat to the House their disagreement to the said resolutions of the Senate, and their agreement to two resolutions contained in the report of the select committee thereupon, in the form of joint resolutions of the two Houses; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table.

The House then proceeded to consider the said report and resolutions: Whereupon, the resolutions of the Senate, to which the Committee of the whole House reported their disagreement, being twice read at the Clerk's table, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, as a testimony of the high sense they entertain of the nautical skill and gallant conduct of Lieutenant Andrew Sterret, commander of the United States' schooner Enterprize, manifested in an engagement with, and in the capture of, a Tripolitan corsair, of superior force, in the Mediterranean sea, fitted out by the Bey of that Regency to harass the trade, capture the vessels, and enslave the citizens, of these States, the President of the United States be requested to present Lieutenant Sterret with a gold medal, with such suitable devices thereon, as he shall deem proper, and emblematic of that heroic action, and the mercy extended to a barbarous enemy, who three times struck his colors, and twice recommenced hostilities; an act of humanity, however unmerited, highly honorable to the American flag and nation; and that the President of the United States be also requested to present to each of the Lieutenants, Porter and Lawson, of the Navy, and Lieutenant Lane of the Marines, who were serving on board the Enterprize in the engagement, and contributed, by their gallant conduct, to the success of the day, a sword, with such suitable devices as the President may deem fit.

"Be it further resolved, In consideration of the intrepid behaviour of the crew of the Enterprize, under the orders of their gallant commander, and their receiving no prize money, the corsair being dismantled and released after her capture, that one month's pay, over and above the usual allowance, be paid to all the other officers, sailors, and marines, who were actually on board and engaged in that action; for the expenditure of which charge Congress will make the necessary appropriation."

The question was taken that the House do concur with the Committee of the whole House in their disagreement to the same, and resolved in the affirmative.

The resolutions contained in the report of the select committee, to which the Committee of the whole House reported their agreement, being twice read, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That they entertain a high sense of the gallant conduct of Lieutenant Sterret, and the other officers, seamen, and marines, on board the schooner Enterprize, in the capture of a Tripolitan corsair, of fourteen guns and eighty men.

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to present to Lieutenant Sterret a sword, commemorative of the aforesaid heroic action; and that one month's extra pay be allowed to all the other officers, seamen, and marines, who were on board the Enterprize when the aforesaid action took place."

The question was taken that the House do concur with the Committee of the whole House in their agreement to the same, and resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the said resolutions be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, of the twenty-fifth instant, to whom was referred the memorial of Lyon Lehman; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

JANUARY, 1802.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition of the said Lyon Lehman is reasonable, and that the said petitioner ought to be refunded the sum of one thousand six hundred and eighty-four dollars, being the amount of duties he paid on the importation of three thousand five hundred rifles and carbines, and two hundred and eighty-seven pair of pistols, into the United States, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. GILES laid on the table a resolution to the following purport:

Resolved, That the census of the Northwestern Territory be referred to a committee, to consider whether any and what measures are necessary at this time relative to granting the people of that Territory a State Government, and to provide for their being admitted into the Union."

Mr. NICHOLSON offered a resolution to the following effect:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House what loan office and final settlement certificates are outstanding and not paid, and whether accounts have been so kept at the Treasury that provision can be made for paying them without subjecting the United States to be defrauded."

This resolution brought on a debate which occupied the remainder of the sitting. In the course of it a great diversity of opinion appeared, and the propriety of altering the statutes of limitation was discussed. A majority of the House appeared to be opposed to touching those statutes, and the resolution was finally rejected.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill for the relief of Lyon Lehman; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Ordered, That the committee appointed, on the twenty-second ultimo, to prepare and bring in a bill or bills for a revision and amendment of the laws for regulating the militia of the United States, have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to lay before this House a statement of the vessels now belonging to the Navy of the United States, with their present state of equipment, and the service in which they are, respectively, employed.

FRIDAY, January 29.

An engrossed bill to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein amended the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," was read the third time; and, on a motion made and seconded, ordered to be recommitted to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of Lawrence Erb from his confinement," was read the third time and passed.

The resolutions in the form of joint resolutions of the two Houses, which were ordered to be engrossed on the twenty-eighth instant, "expressing the sense of Congress on the gallant conduct of Lieutenant Sterret, the officers, and crew, of the United States' schooner Enterprize," were brought in engrossed, and read the third time: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the same, without amendment; and that the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolutions to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

A petition of George Ash was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will pass a law to confirm to the petitioner a right, in fee simple, to a certain quantity of land opposite the mouth of Kentucky river, in the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river, which has heretofore been granted to him by the Shawanese tribe of Indians, for various services rendered to the said tribe of Indians by the petitioner; and, also, that he may be entitled to the benefits and privileges of a citizen of the United States.—Referred to Mr. DAVIS, Mr. MATTOON, and Mr. GREGG; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Ordered, That Lewis Dupre, who presented a petition to this House on the fifth instant, relative to the principles of perpetual motion, which, as the petitioner suggests, have been discovered by him, have leave to withdraw his said petition.

Mr. J. C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the twenty-fifth instant, the petition of John Brainerd and others, made a report; which was read: Whereupon, Ordered, That the consideration of the said report be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for the payment of such loan office and final settlement certificates, as may have been lost, and for the payment or renewal of which application was made prior to the 12th of June, 1799."

Mr. NICHOLSON wished the resolution to be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GRISWOLD suggested the propriety of making the first reference to the Committee of Claims, to ascertain facts; in which he was supported by Mr. BAYARD, and opposed by Mr. SOUTHARD.

The reference to a Committee of the Whole was lost; and then it was referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion of Mr. GILES, it was

Resolved, That the census of the inhabitants of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report whether any, and what, measures ought, at this time, to be taken for enabling the people of the said Territory to form a State government for themselves, to be admitted into the Union upon the same terms with the original States.

Ordered, That Mr. GILES, Mr. GRISWOLD, Mr. ROBERT WILLIAMS, Mr. RUTLEDGE, Mr. JONES,

H. OF R.

Samuel Dexter.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Mr. LEWIS R. MORRIS, and Mr. CONDIT, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Petitions from sundry inhabitants of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, whose names are thereunto respectively subscribed, were presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will consider the present situation of the petitioners, and disagree to any law or plan that may be passed or devised, contrary to their benefit and accommodation, and which may tend to a separation of the said Territory into one or more divisions, in opposition to the wishes and interest of the petitioners, and other inhabitants of the said Territory; also, that Congress will be pleased to consider what measures may, at this time, be proper to be taken for the establishment of a State government in the said Territory, and its admission into the Union.

Ordered, That the said petitions, together with such parts of the petition of sundry other inhabitants of the said Territory, as relate to the admission of new States into the Union, whenever it may be deemed expedient by Congress, presented on the twentieth, twenty-fifth, and twenty-seventh instant, be referred to the committee last appointed; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A memorial of George Helmbold, jun., of the city of Philadelphia, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will, by law, extend to all paintings, portraits, and engravings, executed and published within the United States, the benefits and privileges contained in the act, entitled "An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned," passed the thirty-first day of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. JONES, Mr. CUTLER, and Mr. MITCHILL; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The bill authorizing the payment of two thousand and eight hundred dollars to Philip Sloan; was taken up in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday, next.

Resolved, That the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business be directed to inquire into the expediency of continuing in force, for a longer time, the whole, or any part of an act, entitled "An act to augment the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned," passed the second of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, which act will expire the second of March next, and that the committee be authorized to report such alterations in the salaries of said officers as to them may seem advisable; and that said committee report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. GILES said as a report was soon expected from the Committee of Ways and Means, it was important to ascertain the sense of Congress on the continuance of an establishment attended with a considerable expense. He said he alluded to the Mint. If it should appear that this establishment cost more than the benefits derived from it, he presumed it would be discontinued. He, therefore, submitted a resolution, declaring that the several acts in relation to the Mint ought to be repealed.

Ordered to lie on the table.

MONDAY, February 1.

An engrossed bill authorizing the payment of two thousand and eight hundred dollars to Philip Sloan was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LEWIS R. MORRIS, one of the members for the State of Vermont, presented to the House two resolutions of the General Assembly of the said State, agreed to by the two branches of the Legislature, on the nineteenth and twenty-third of October, one thousand eight hundred and one, proposing certain amendments to the Constitution of the United States in the case of the choice of Electors for President and Vice President of the United States, and of Representatives to Congress from the States, respectively, which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion, it was Ordered, That the committee appointed, on the thirty-first of December last, on "so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relate to naval preparations, and the establishment of sites for naval purposes," be authorized to cause such documents to be printed for the use of the members, as may be deemed proper by the said committee, previous to the presentation of the same to the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the protection of the commerce and seamen of the United States, in the Mediterranean and adjoining seas," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments of the Senate to the bill last mentioned: Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said amendments, together with the bill, be committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, enclosing a statement of the vessels now belonging to the Navy of the United States, with their present state of equipment, and the service in which they are respectively employed, in pursuance of a resolution of the House of the twenty-eighth ultimo; which were read and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to prevent intrusion on the public lands, and for other purposes; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

SAMUEL DEXTER.

A bill for the settlement of the account of Samuel Dexter, Esq., relative to the suit instituted by Joseph Hodgson, was read a third time.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

Mr. ALSTON moved to postpone the farther consideration of this bill, until the first Monday in December next. He thought it altogether improper to do anything in the business at that time.

Mr. EUSTIS, opposed the postponement and stated the grounds on which the committee went who reported the bill. The suit he said was in fact the suit of the Government. Mr. Dexter ought to be indemnified for his expense and time.

Mr. GILES advocated the postponement.

Mr. BAYARD observed that the principles had been correctly stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts. The suit was substantially the suit of the Government, and, said Mr. B., I ask if anything can be more flagrantly wrong, more iniquitously unjust, than to allow the suit to be the suit of the United States, and yet, because we have the power, deny to pay the expenses.

Mr. BAYARD, spoke at some length in favor of the bill and against a postponement, and was followed by Messrs. GRISWOLD, RUTLEDGE, T. MORRIS, and HASTINGS, on the same side. Messrs. HOLLAND, BACON, and SPRIGG, spoke in favor of postponing. The question for postponement was then put—for it 36, against it 56.

It was then referred to a Committee of the whole House, and Mr. J. C. SMITH, took the Chair. The bill was so amended as to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle Mr. Dexter's account for the expenses incurred by the suit, and for his time and personal expenses, not exceeding six dollars a day, for the time necessarily employed in attending to the suit and in travelling. In the House the amendment was agreed to, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—51 voting in favor of it.

Mr. GILES called up his resolution respecting the Mint, which he moved should be referred to the Committee of the Whole; which was agreed to, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

TUESDAY, February 2.

An engrossed bill to authorize the settlement of the account of Samuel Dexter, for his expense in defending against the suit of Joseph Hodgson, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. SPRIGG, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of Samuel Harvey Howard, and other officers of the courts of Maryland; which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether any, and what, measures have been taken for treating with the Indians south of the Ohio, in consequence of an act of Congress, passed the thirteenth of May, one thousand eight hundred, entitled "An act to appropriate a certain sum of money to defray the expense of holding a treaty or treaties with the Indians."

Ordered, That Mr. STANLEY and Mr. DAWSON be appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the protection of the commerce and seamen of the United States in the Mediterranean and adjoining seas;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported their agreement to the same, without amendment.

The House then proceeded to consider the said amendments; and, on the question that the House do concur with the Committee of the Whole in their agreement to the same, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to prevent intrusion on the public lands, and for other purposes; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means.

A Message was received from the President of the United States transmitting returns of arms, fortifications, &c.

The said Message, and the documents accompanying the same, were read: whereupon,

Ordered, That such parts thereof as relate to the military stores of the United States be referred to the committee appointed on the 22d of December last, on the same subject.

Ordered, That the residue of the said Message do lie on the table.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish this House with copies of any documents in his office relative to the object of the voyage or crews of the frigate Insurgent and brigantine Pickering, lately belonging to the Navy of the United States; and, also, to state the time when, and the place from whence, they sailed, together with any other information respecting their loss, which it may be in his power to furnish.

WEDNESDAY, February 3.

Mr. DAVIS, one of the members from the State of Kentucky, presented to the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, addressed to him as Chairman of the committee to whom were referred, on the eighth of December last, and the eighteenth, twenty-fifth, and twenty-sixth ultimo, the petition of James McCashen and others, the memorials of John Cleves Symmes, and of George Turner, and the petitions of sundry purchasers and settlers on the lands originally contracted for by John Cleves Symmes, between the Great and Little Miami rivers, enclosing a letter and report from the Receiver of the Land Office at Cincinnati, respecting the lands applied for under an act of the last session of Congress, giving a pre-emption right to certain purchasers under John Cleves Symmes; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion, it was Ordered, That the report of the committee of the thirtieth of December last, appointed on the fourteenth of the same month, "to inquire into the expediency or inexpediency of giving further time to persons entitled to military land warrants to obtain and locate the same; and, also, to report what provision ought to be made by law to authorize the Secretary of War to issue military land warrants, and duplicates of the same, where satisfactory proof is made that the originals have been lost, destroyed, or obtained by fraud," which lay on the table, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the said committee; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several resolutions thereupon; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follow:

Resolved, That further time ought to be given to the holders or proprietors of military land warrants to register and locate the same.

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law, authorizing the holders of warrants, or certificates in the nature of warrants, under an hundred acres, to locate the same.

Resolved, That all warrants or certificates located on a less quantity than four thousand acres, shall be located on the unlocated parts of the fifty quarter townships and fractional quarter townships.

Resolved, That warrants, or certificates in the nature of warrants, which have or shall issue for a quantity less than an hundred acres, shall be located on the fractional parts of lots that are less than an hundred acres, and in no other place.

Resolved, That the holders or proprietors of warrants for military services, who shall locate the same on the quarter townships, or fractional part of quarter townships, after the — day of — next, shall obtain patents in their own name.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions, and that Mr. DAVIS, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. TALLMADGE, Mr. DENNIS, and Mr. FEARING, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Lyon Lehman.

The Committee rose and reported the same without amendment; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Daniel W. Coxe and others; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose without coming to any decision.

THURSDAY, February 4.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Lyman Lehman was read the third time, and passed.

A remonstrance of sundry inhabitants within the jurisdiction of the Corporation of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will not pass into a law the bill for establishing the Territory of Columbia, now pending before this House; or that the said bill may be so amended or modified as to augment the powers of the Corporation of Georgetown, for the convenience and benefit of the remonstrants, and the other inhabitants of the said District.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole House appointed on the twenty-sixth ultimo, to whom was committed the bill referred to in the said remonstrance.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Daniel W. Coxe and others; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the bill with an amendment.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the said bill and amendment: Whereupon, a motion was made, and the question being put, that the said bill, with the amendment, be committed to the consideration of a Committee of the whole House, it passed in the negative.

Ordered, That the farther consideration of the said bill and amendment be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. Thomas moved the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of extinguishing the claims of the United States for certain balances, which, by the Commissioners appointed to settle the accounts between the United States and the individual States, were reported to be due from several of the States to the United States."

Ordered, That the said motion be committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, enclosing copies of the sailing orders given to the commanders of the frigate Insurgent and brigantine Pickering, transmitted in pursuance of a resolution of the second instant; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

JUDICIARY BILL.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes," was read a first time, and Mr. GILES moved that it should have a second reading.

Mr. BAYARD supposed the object in having it read a second time was for the purpose of committing the bill. He thought it should be committed to the select committee appointed some weeks ago to take this subject under consideration. Mr. B. said it was not to produce delay that he proposed this. On common occasions, there was no doubt a subject would be so disposed of. He had no wish to affect any favorite plan gentlemen have determined on, by proposing this reference.

Mr. RANDOLPH thought it proper the principle of the bill should be settled in Committee of the Whole, and moved a reference to that effect.

Mr. GILES was in favor of its being referred to a Committee of the Whole; there was no detail, he said, in the bill. If it should be referred to the committee proposed, there was no prospect that they would in any reasonable time make a report. One of the gentlemen appointed on that committee had been prevented by indisposition from even attending it, and there was very little prospect of that committee coming to any agreement without that member.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

[Mr. G. must have alluded to the members being equally divided in political sentiments.]

But, said Mr. G., this is not my only reason for wishing it to go to the Committee of the Whole. Gentlemen are mistaken if they think there has been any concert on this subject; or, if there has been any, it is wholly without my knowledge.

He wished the bill to be taken up on Monday; there had been great agitation in the community excited by the subject of that bill. It had been very ably discussed in the Senate, and it was very necessary to decide this great Constitutional question in this House as early as would be consistent with the importance of the subject; because he believed the agitation produced in the country would subside as soon as the business was settled in this House.

Mr. RUTLEDGE said he was really surprised at this motion's coming from the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) who had moved the resolution, in consequence of which the select committee had been raised on the subject of this bill. The Chairman of that committee had never called the members together, but let the subject lie dormant, because he knew it was before the other branch of the Legislature, and waited for a decision there; and now, when it has come to us, that gentleman is for sending it to another committee, without first moving to discharge the select committee. He hoped gentlemen in favor of this bill would not whip on with such unusual speed because they are the majority.

Mr. R. said he really could not understand another gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES,) when he says, to refer the bill to the select committee, will be to delay the business, because there would be a tie in the committee, the umpire being detained by indisposition from attending. If this tie was in the House instead of the committee, there would be some grounds for the objection. But if there should be any appearance of delay in the committee, the majority of this House would discharge them immediately.

Mr. R. was disposed to adhere to the forms usually observed; it was the most correct as well as fairest mode of transacting business.

Mr. GRISWOLD agreed that in Committee of the Whole was the proper place to discuss and decide great and general principles. But in this bill there were considerable details, and was it not, he asked, more correct to send it to a select committee to settle that detail, which could not be properly done in Committee of the Whole? As to the absence of one gentleman on the select committee, that could be easily remedied by appointing another in his place.

Suppose the House should go into Committee on the bill, and a majority say they like the principle but do not the detail, must it not then be referred to a select committee to settle the detail?

Mr. G. said it had been the uniform practice of the House to refer in the first instance, and he hoped the House would not deviate from it. If, instead of this bill, there was a resolution offered to this House proposing to repeal the two laws of last session respecting the Judiciary, then it would be proper to decide on it first in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMILIE advocated a reference to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GODDARD expressed his solicitude that the bill should go first to the select committee, that everything like the pride of party or the pride of opinion might be prevented from attaching itself to this bill. When the select committee reported, and that was taken up in Committee of the Whole, the discussion would be entered upon with more candor, and gentlemen would be more likely to be open to conviction.

Mr. MILLEDGE was in favor of the motion; he wished to call the attention of the House to two instances where bills had been reported by select committees without the principles being settled in Committee of the Whole, and he begged gentlemen to call to mind the consequence of that mode of proceeding, and the great delay it occasioned.

Mr. S. SMITH observed, as there had been something like censure thrown on the committee appointed on the subject of the Judiciary, he would mention some reasons why that committee could not be expected to have considered the subject very fully. Some considerable time after the appointment of that committee, the Chairman (Mr. RANDOLPH) informed the House that he was Chairman and member of so many committees that he could not attend to them all, and asked to be excused from serving on this committee; when another gentleman was appointed in his place, so that the subject could only be considered as being before the committee from about the 20th of January.

Mr. GILES said he had been in some measure anticipated by the gentleman last up. It had been urged, give the bill to a select committee first to settle the detail; when it comes forward here, if a majority should be opposed to the principle, he would ask whether the reference in such a case would not be wholly unnecessary? The principle, he contended, should first be settled in a Committee of the Whole.

The select committee to whom some gentlemen wished to refer this bill, had, since the 20th of January, had an important and the most voluminous subject under consideration that would come before the House the present year. He alluded to the petition of the Wyoming claimants and the documents accompanying it, which would take up the time of the committee for two weeks to read them through.

Mr. G. said, that if party sensations ever could be buried, the subject of the bill before them was the most proper for making an effort, and have that disposition discovered. Party triumph, he agreed, had too long predominated, and he hoped the time would soon come when such triumph would cease. He thought this great Constitutional subject had come forward for decision at a most fortunate period. There was a general tranquillity in the country and a fair discussion could be had. The whole bill was a single proposition, to wit, Shall two laws of last session be repealed? and it could be very well determined in a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DANA acknowledged himself particularly pleased with the sentiments of the gentleman who had just sat down. He thought it highly interesting to our common country that the triumph of party should be checked on this occasion. The most likely mode of checking such triumph would be that the whole business should proceed in its usual course, and that the majority should not precipitate it excessively. Some most important subjects had been delayed by the members not being in possession of the documents. This subject ought to come before them in its least exceptionable shape, that discussion may be had with an understanding of the subject. It had been said this bill from the Senate was a single proposition, because it only proposes to repeal two laws. Gentlemen might call it a single proposition if it were proposed that the Constitution should be destroyed. Though it is called a single proposition, it is not a simple one; on the contrary it is one of the most complex. It is already determined the Judiciary system shall be abolished, that it shall swallow up every thing that comes in its way; yet he thought it ought to be done in such a way as to do as little injury to others as possible.

Mr. BAYARD.—It is urged we should go into Committee of the Whole to settle the principle of the bill. There is no principle in the bill. I do not mean any play upon the words. If a single insulated principle were to be settled, the course proposed by gentlemen would be correct. But we are going to decide a general question, involving vast details. If gentlemen will unfetter themselves from the manacles of party prejudice, they will on examination find it the correct course that this bill should go to the select committee.

The object is to repeal the law of last session. Are there six gentlemen in this House who can say what that law is? Is there one who can tell me even how many sections there are in it, or what is contained in a single section? Is it possible that the blindness of party spirit can say we will repeal a law though we do not know what it is? Would you not on any other subject send a bill repealing very complex laws to a select committee?

You could scarcely find a section of any law having so much detail as the first section of this bill; the second has also much and the third more detail. It is not easy to say what acts would be repealed by this bill. The laws of the last session were not confined to merely establishing new courts and new judges, but there were many wholesome amendments to the old system incorporated in these laws, which, if you repeal by this repealing act, you will be obliged again to establish in some other way.

A month of close application, by the most industrious person could not make him master of this subject, so as to see the operation of this bill on those it is intended to affect. And are gentlemen prepared to say they will repeal those laws even if on examination they find them useful?

In another more important detail, I will pledge myself to prove it defective:—with respect to suits existing originally in the old court, by the laws of last session, brought into the new court, and now transferred to the old court again. Can gentlemen say no criminal will escape justice, and no man lose his suit by passing this bill? There never was a general question involving more detail than this bill.

Gentlemen are even frustrating their own object. What is the object of gentlemen? They will lose no time by the mode we propose, we shall gain none. I believe the laws of last session will be repealed; they are considered as repealed through the country. A gentleman has said there was no concert on this subject; I do not know that it has been debated in what are called caucuses. [Mr. RANDOLPH called to order. The SPEAKER decided against him.] Mr. B. proceeded: I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, there was no need of concert in the business. I was not blaming these meetings, in what are called caucuses. I do not see why thirty or forty members may not meet together to talk on politics, or any other more entertaining subject, as well as a smaller number. I was astonished to hear the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) say what he did about the agitation of the public mind. Does he tremble at the agitation this subject has excited? Does his security consist in the apathy of public sentiment? The public mind should be agitated on this question; the people should know what we are about. If they have any thing to say, I wish to hear it. I wish it to go to the people, and even that it should be decided by their vote. This is not a measure originating from the people; if it were, the more it should be agitated by the people the better it would be for that gentleman.

I meant no reflection on the select committee to whom the subject of this bill was referred. I was not dissatisfied with them, but I am dissatisfied with the excuse the gentleman from Maryland has made for them. I am sorry he implicated the Speaker in that apology, who, it must be presumed, knew what committees the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) was chairman of, and of how many he was a member when appointed chairman of another, from attending which he very properly afterwards requested to be excused. It is proper this bill should go to the select committee, that the general question may be so presented to the House, as that it may be fairly discussed.

The question on referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole was then taken, and carried—54 voting in favor of it.

When the SPEAKER asked, "For what day shall it be made the order?" Mr. DAVIS proposed Monday week.

Mr. GILES believed the business of the session would not progress until this subject was decided; he wished it the order for Thursday next.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

Mr. BAYARD hoped Monday week would be agreed to; he had not heard much of the debate in the Senate, or read a single speech. He wished time to read the speeches. He knew they could only rely on the candor and accommodation of gentlemen for this indulgence. As to those who had made up their minds upon the subject, and who did not intend to speak, they could not have a common feeling with him on this occasion. If gentlemen would allow them time to prepare, they would meet the friends of the bill, and discuss its merits with all that calmness and deliberation on their part that could be expected. But if they were hurried into the subject, he feared, that with the exercise of all their Christian patience and forbearance, it would not be possible.

Mr. NICHOLSON said, as the gentleman from Delaware has promised, on the part of his friends, to meet us in the discussion of this question with a great deal of forbearance, like good Christians, if it be postponed until Monday week, I shall vote for that day, and hope it will be carried.

The question for Monday week was then put and carried—54 voting for it.

FRIDAY, February 5.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was recommitted, on the twenty-ninth ultimo, an engrossed bill to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," reported an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and, together with the said bill, ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-day.

A memorial of sundry citizens of the United States, and resident merchants of the city of Baltimore, and State of Maryland, was presented to the House and read, praying relief in the case of numerous and heavy losses sustained by the memorialists, in consequence of the illegal capture and confiscation of their property, under the authority of the French Government, prior to the promulgation of the late Convention between the United States and France; in the provisions of which compact the memorialists discover an unqualified surrender of their claims, instead of the redress which they expected to obtain.—Referred to Mr. GILES, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. LOWNDES, Mr. MILLEDGE, Mr. TALLMADGE, Mr. ROBERT WILLIAMS, Mr. DAVIS, and Mr. GREGG; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to appoint one or more Commissioners, as he may deem necessary, on the part of the United States, to adjust, on principles of equity, the existing disputes between the Commissioners of the City of Washington and the Trustees of the city property, original proprietors, and other persons who conceive themselves injured by the several alterations which, from time to time, have been made in the plan of the city; and, having adjusted the same, that he be, and he is hereby, requested to endeavor to procure from the trustees aforesaid, a conveyance to the United States of the streets, squares, and other public grounds therein.

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to cause to be prepared and laid before Congress, for their sanction, a plan of the City of Washington, conforming, as nearly as may be, to the original design thereof, except where, in consequence of the alterations made in the same, the rights of individuals, the principles of justice, and the manifest interest of the United States, may require a deviation."

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to Mr. DENNIS, Mr. JOHN TALIAFERRO, Jr., Mr. GRISWOLD, Mr. SPRIGG, and Mr. DAWSON; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the engrossed bill to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported their agreement to the amendment proposed by the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures thereupon; which was again read, and, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House; and the bill, with the amendment, was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill for the relief of Isaac Zane; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress; and on the question that the Committee of the whole House have leave to sit again on the said bill, it passed in the negative.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House be discharged from the farther consideration thereof; and that the said bill be recommitted to Mr. JACKSON, Mr. FEARING, Mr. VAN HORNE, Mr. DAVIS, and Mr. BAYARD.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making certain partial appropriations for the year one thousand eight hundred and two; which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

On motion, of Mr. GILES, it was

Resolved, That the committee to whom was referred a Message from the President of the United States, of the eleventh ultimo, accompanying a memorial and letter to him, from the Commissioners of the City of Washington, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of discontinuing the offices of the Commissioners of the said city; and to report by bill or otherwise.

MONDAY, February 8.

An engrossed bill to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," was read the third time.

H. OF R.

Imprisonment for Debt—The Mint.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said bill be postponed until to-morrow.

A memorial of sundry merchants of the city of Philadelphia was presented to the House and read, praying relief in the case of injuries inflicted on the commerce of the memorialists, during the late European war, by the predatory cruisers belonging to the French Republic.—Referred to the committee appointed on the fifth instant, to whom was referred a memorial of sundry merchants of the city of Baltimore, to the same effect.

A memorial of sundry citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, was presented to the House and read, praying a repeal of the act of Congress, passed on the thirteenth of February, one thousand eight hundred and one, entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the Courts of the United States," for certain reasons therein specified.—Referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the fourth instant the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the committee to whom was referred, on the eleventh ultimo, the petition of Thomas Bruff, of Joseph, in the State of Maryland, relative to the principles of perpetual motion, which, as the petitioner suggests, have been discovered by him, made a report; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

Mr. D. HEISTER, from the committee appointed on the 22d of December last, presented a bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing an uniform Militia throughout the United States," passed the eighth of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

Mr. MITCHILL, from the committee to whom was referred, on the thirty-first of December last, so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to "naval preparations, and the establishment of sites for naval purposes," made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House on Wednesday next.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was recommitted, on the twenty-second ultimo, the bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to lay and collect a direct tax," reported an amendatory bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Wednesday next.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Mr. SMILIE called up his resolution that a committee be appointed to revise the laws respecting imprisonment for debts due the United States. His objects, he said, were two; to secure the debtor's property, and to inflict some penalty or provide some remedy instead of imprisonment for life.

Mr. RUTLEDGE was opposed to imprisonment for life, where the debtor gave up his whole property, and was unable to pay all. He had known, in South Carolina, revenue officers imprisoned for debts due the United States, who had been many years confined; men of good character, men of honesty, but who, through ignorance of transacting certain business, or their misfortunes, were unable to pay. He knew an individual of that State who had applied to that House for relief; his petition was referred to the Secretary of the Treasury; the Secretary felt a delicacy in interfering in the case; the petition was not granted; and the person had now been in jail five years, though his inability to pay did not arise from having wasted the public money, or from aught but misfortune; for he was acknowledged to be a man of good character. He was averse to such cruelty. Hence the necessity of making some provision that the innocent, when distinctions can, as in most instances, be made, may not be subjected to cruel punishments, that were of no benefit to the United States. Why send him to jail? Why lock him up there? Why prevent his being able to support his family?

Mr. SMILIE.—It is the case that when you exceed in making your laws what is reasonable, those laws, as the present concerning debtors to the United States, will not be executed. The present law cannot be put in execution. He wished some sufficient penalty. This was not the proper stage to give his sentiments; were it, he should say, he thought the defaulter ought to give up the property, and perhaps be imprisoned a period. But the Legislature are not the proper judges, and ought not to interfere; the Legislative and Judicial departments should be kept separate. We want some uniform law, operating on all according to their demerit.

The subject was postponed till to-morrow.

THE MINT.

The House, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the motion referred to them, on the first instant, viz:

Resolved, That so much of the acts, the one entitled "An act establishing a Mint and regulating the coins of the United States," the other an act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," as relate to the establishing a Mint, ought to be repealed.

Mr. GILES said, he had seen a bill making appropriation for continuing the Mint Establishment; he knew it was questionable whether or not it was intended to repeal the law creating that establishment; his wish was to discover the opinions of the House on the subject. He had ever been opposed to the establishment from the beginning; he thought we ought to have no establishment the expenses of which surpassed the profit—that is, he would have no sinecures, or persons receiving money without rendering adequate services.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

The Mint.

H. OF R.

Mr. G. here showed the deficiencies of the Mint Establishment. He further observed that the gold and silver coined in the Mint were better than the coins of other countries, and were much of them used by jewellers and silversmiths. The machinery of the Mint, he was informed, wanted repair; he had also been informed that the machinery might be disposed of to advantage to the Bank of the United States; and, perhaps, that bank might coin for us, and save much expense. On the whole, he was firm in the opinion that it was a needless expense, and ought not to be continued.

Mr. DANA.—If the standard coin is better than that of other countries, we have only to make the proper alterations. The question is, whether we shall have one of our own? By not having one of our own, we shall, as we have been before, be exposed to many disadvantages, to many frauds from the circulation of base metal, especially copper.

Mr. LOWNDES.—We proceed with too much precipitation. This establishment was made after mature deliberation, let it not be abolished without hesitation. We ought to make inquiry; we want information on the subject. If, after such information on the subject is received as will enable us to vote understandingly, it shall appear improper to continue the establishment, I shall be as forward as any one in repealing the law by which it was made. I am not in favor of sinecures, more than the gentleman from Virginia, or any other member. I will go as far in preventing sinecures, or the payment of money where services adequate are not rendered, as any man. I would not stop here; where such sinecures appear, I will join to abolish them. The duties of the Secretary of War, especially since the late reduction of the Army, are now very inconsiderable; the duties of the Secretary of the Navy and those of the Secretary of War can easily be performed by one officer. [Called to order.] I wish delay till we shall receive the necessary information on the subject.

Mr. S. SMITH said, he believed the books now in the House, and the last report of the Director of the Mint, furnished all the information necessary.

Mr. LOWNDES observed, that there has been no report this session. A report appears the more necessary at this time, when the abolishment is contemplated.

Mr. GILES said, by the report of last session we have or can receive information sufficient. By that and other reports it will be found that the establishment is expensive, is unprofitable, and will probably continue so. I can see no need for revising. I am for abolishing altogether. Perhaps the coinage may be done by the Bank of the United States, if it be necessary that it should be done. I can see no propriety in continuing the establishment. The gentleman from Connecticut speaks of uniting the office of Secretary of War and of the Navy. [Called to order.]

Mr. HOLLAND thought gentlemen had all made up their opinions; it was, plainly, expensive and unprofitable. He should vote for repealing.

Mr. MITCHILL spoke at considerable length, discovering much ingenuity and acquaintance with the subject. He was against a total repeal, especially as we should be subjected to great inconveniences from abolishing the copper coinage.

Mr. RUTLEDGE.—If it be true that it is useless, all will agree in abolishing. It has heretofore been customary to show, when about to abolish an establishment, what the state of that establishment was. No such statement has been given. Two years ago it was attempted to abolish this establishment, all suitable information was received at that time, and the bill for repealing was lost. Shall we proceed to act now without information?

Mr. R. regretted that he was unable to hear the gentleman from New York, (Mr. MITCHILL.) He perceived that that gentleman had viewed the subject thoroughly and found that it would be improper to repeal; he hoped the observations of that gentleman would have due effect on the opinion of the House. Mr. R. wished the Committee to rise, without leave to sit again, that the matter might be referred to a select committee, who could examine the subject, and would be enabled to make a report, founded on a knowledge of facts. He would, however, declare that he had no predilection for the establishment, nor any wish to have sinecures, but he had not sufficient knowledge of the present state of the establishment to vote understandingly.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—It is admitted there are advantages arising from the establishment. It has driven from circulation the base gold of Germany, and English silver. I had hoped the gentleman who introduced this resolution would have given us a statement of the present situation of the Mint. He was unable to decide till he should have more knowledge of the subject. If the advantages exceed the expense, he should be for continuing; if not, for repealing.

Mr. S. SMITH.—If we could gain any further information, he should be for the Committee's rising; but he thought no further information of importance could be had. Mr. S. went into a brief examination of the expense and the profits. Among other objections he said that it cost half a dollar to coin a cent.

Mr. S. observed that we might, at much less expense than as now, send to Birmingham, England, to have our copper coined. If there were a probability of our having mines of our own, there might be some pretext for their continuance.

Perhaps a national pride, or national dignity, may be the inducement. Such motives did not actuate him. He had as high sense of national pride as any, but did not imagine that this was any mark of national dignity. The small States of Germany still coin money, so does Scotland, but he did not think such coinage any mark of their independence.

Mr. DANA.—If we allow the gentleman to attribute motives to others, he can set up his men of straw as easily as we can pull them down. We have no such Scotch pride, as represented. It is important that we should have some Mint establishment. We ought not to have a fluctuating medium. Whether the present be the best mode of coinage I know not. I am willing to make any revisions that may be found necessary. The gentleman from New York has gone into the matter fully—has said much to confirm me in the opinion that this establishment is necessary.

The gentleman from Maryland has told us that the coinage of every cent costs half a dollar; this is an assertion that he thought would have exceeded even the legislative intrepidity of that gentleman.

Mr. RUTLEDGE.—The gentleman from Maryland has said much on the subject, all of which, he believed, could be answered in a few words. Make your copper lighter, if it ought to be; give alloy to your gold, if that of other countries is not so valuable. Let the subject go to a select committee, who can see what alterations can and ought to be made; what offices reduced; what departments combined, or, perhaps, what parts of the establishment may be abolished.

Mr. ELMER.—He hoped it would go to a committee. We want information. We ought well to consider the inconveniences that may arise from abolishing. If more evils than benefits grow out of the establishment, he should be for abolishing; if more benefits than disadvantages, he should wish it to continue. But he wanted information. He was not then content to decide.

Mr. MITCHELL.—We were again unable fully to hear Mr. M. His observations appeared to be mostly directed to the subject of copper coinage, and to show the necessity of coining our own. He corrected Mr. S. SMITH with respect to his statement of Scotland's coining her own money. The place where the coining was done, to which Mr. S. alluded was a place of confinement for convicts—he had been there and well knew. Mr. M. went largely into the subject of base copper coinage; the danger of great disadvantages arising to us from the introduction of it here, unless we had copper coinage of our own to prevent it.

Mr. S. SMITH.—He could not see how we should be able to obtain further information. He would explain as to what the gentleman from Connecticut had said. His assertion of the expense (that every cent costs half a dollar) was a lapsus lingue; he did not mean to have it understood as literally true.

Mr. BAYARD.—It was not to be supposed that because gentlemen wished the Committee to rise, they were opposed to the resolution—the object was to have the subject go to a select committee, who might give it an attentive examination, from documents which they might, but which were not now obtained. In addition to the learned and cogent observations of the gentleman from New York, he would ask what he had to guard against the introduction of base coins? We had been, and we should again be, liable to impositions, especially from the circulation of Spanish gold.

Another consideration was, the necessity of some regulated medium in small change. Copper had heretofore passed two, four, and six for one. There were persons whose sole business was speculating in these base metals. Coppers were brought by the cask from Birmingham; after a short time circulating their baseness was discovered—their value sunk, and the loss generally fell on the poorer class of citizens. The poorest of the people were in this manner taxed in one year far more than the amount of supporting this establishment.

Mr. B. duly appreciated the knowledge and talents of the gentleman who introduced this resolution. They may be equal to the united talents and knowledge of a committee of five; yet such was not common. It was not usual for one to inquire so deeply—so fully—as a committee of several.

The gentleman from Maryland informs us that we can send to Birmingham to have our coining done; true, but the gentleman might have gone much further; the expenses of legislation are great; we may also send to Westminster to have our laws made, and thus save the expense of four or five hundred thousand dollars. Our own coinage is moreover emblematic of our sovereignty; this consideration ought to have some effect.

If on inquiry it should be found proper to abolish wholly the institution, he should readily join; but he was not ready without reflection or distinction to go any length with those who seem actuated only by an indiscriminate rage for pulling down and destroying establishments.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—He thought the banks were sufficient to prevent the circulation of base money. He asserted that nineteen-twentieths of the silver in circulation was not coinage of our own, but Spanish milled dollars and their parts. He could not see how our sovereignty was affected by having our coinage done elsewhere, any more than by the purchase of cordage or the casting of cannon.

The gentleman from Delaware laughs at the idea of going to Westminster for our laws. Mr. R. was surprised at this. He had thought the gentleman a great advocate for such laws—that it was his favorite doctrine to go there for our laws. The gentleman had lately taken up the cause of the poor—a cause with which he is just becoming acquainted. Should those who had always advocated their cause become hardened by prosperity, and forget the professions which had gained them the confidence of the people, he hoped and expected they should be dismissed by them.

Mr. R. begged pardon for having detained the Committee, but as it seemed the order of the day when a subject was started to consume the whole day, he believed he was not out of order.

Mr. GILES.—In the discussion of this subject gentlemen had branched out exceedingly, but he believed it all came to one point—the want of information. He had some days since notified that he should introduce the resolution. He was satisfied no further information of consequence would be obtained, and there is already sufficient to enable us to judge correctly. It is hinted that it will be proposed to obtain a report from the Mint. He believed it unnecessary. Mr. Boudinot is in Philadelphia. We must send to him—he will report when he pleases, and after all we shall receive no information of any consequence.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

The Mint.

H. OF R.

There is a difference between this and other countries. Other nations need to coin their own money; it is not with them the general, but the partial good; it is aggrandizement of individuals, the trappings of royalty. Here it is true you established a Mint; you have raised armies and fleets, &c. to create an Executive influence; but what do the people say now? They send men here now to govern, who shall not govern for themselves, but for the people.

Mr. DANA.—When we shall be deprived of the right of debating, it will be full time for gentlemen to criminate, but not now. The gentleman from Virginia, as usual, talks more or less to the purpose on every subject on which he undertakes to speak; like the sun on a cloud he may illuminate in some measure, but neither give nor leave any lasting substance or weight. Mr. D. was in favor of the resolutions going to a select committee.

Mr. MACON.—The Mint has been in operation ten years—see what has been done—its inutility is evident. Money goes constantly from here to the East Indies; will not the American dollars go? Shall we be always coining? Mr. M. thought the Bank of the United States might be authorized to coin.

Mr. S. SMITH was of the same opinion.

Mr. RUTLEDGE, also; and he wished inquiry might be made of the bank whether it could be done, and on what terms, before he undertook to abolish.

Mr. R. dilated on the necessity of continuing the copper coinage, at least; and he wished the resolution to go to a select committee, who should thoroughly understand the subject, and show what could best be done; he was not for thus rapidly hastening in the work of indiscriminate demolition.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—The gentleman from Virginia thinks he has all necessary information on the subject; far was Mr. G. from thinking he had; he would inform the gentleman from Virginia that the coinage of copper will pay its own expense, and more. Perhaps it will be best to abolish the coinage of gold and silver, and retain only the copper; he did not know; he wished it referred to a committee who should be able, on examination, to decide.

Mr. BAYARD.—He acknowledged there had been aberrations from the subject; but he believed those had been most guilty who had made the most complaint of others. We have been told that it is our object to delay. Why is this charge made? Has it any foundation in truth? If there be delay, the fault is not ours; and I call on them to show whence is the delay of which they complain, and from what cause it arises. If there be delay, those are the authors of it who have all power in their own hands—not the minority.

Gentlemen have said we have all necessary information on the subject. I have not—others have not. We know not on what terms it might be possible to agree with the bank, should it be thought advisable to discontinue the establishment ourselves; should it be thought best to continue the establishment, we know not how much lower might be the salaries of the officers concerned; from the vaunting declarations of some gentlemen, that we are become so much more enlightened, so much more patriotic than formerly, so ready to hug the doctrine of virtue's being its own reward, he was induced to think there might be found men who would conduct the establishment, without salaries, without any other fee or reward than the sweet gratification of having served the people. Any communication from the Director of the Mint can be easily and readily procured, if necessary.

Gentlemen have informed us that the coinage of every cent costs fifty cents. Is it this kind of information that gentlemen have, and on which they rely? The fact is not so. The establishment has been expensive from the coinage of gold and silver, not from that of copper, which more than pays itself.

Gentlemen talk of royalty, and very awkwardly charge the late administrations of attachment to monarchical measures; if they prefer the subject to any other irrelevant matter, he had no objection, but he did not wish to have attributed to himself sentiments he had never suggested. He had said that the coining of our own was a mark of our sovereignty, not of our royalty, as insinuated. He did not consider that royalty and sovereignty was the same thing; the people originally, or their power given to their delegated government, constituted the sovereignty. Why do gentlemen endeavor to catch the popular ear by their empty vociferations, charging the late administrations, and the present minority in Congress, with a fondness for royalty? Why forever sounding this imaginary attachment in our ears? The time will come—it must come—when the people will be undeceived; when they will judge of men, of their Government, not by their vain professions, but by their actions.

The gentleman (Mr. RANDOLPH) endeavors to have it believed that I am attached to English laws; so, indeed, I am to many of the sacred principles of those laws—the trial by jury, the habeas corpus, &c.—principles avowed in the Bill of Rights of our constitutions, principles brought with us from England, in which we have been educated, and which I hope will ever continue to distinguish, to govern us; principles that could never impel me to tear down or root up, with the rage of revolutionary spirit, all that is useful or valuable, without hesitation, without distinction; yet that gentleman never heard me express a fondness for English laws, in the sense in which he wishes it to be understood.

The gentleman talks of my taking just now the poor under my protection. The time did exist when the poor did not need that protection, when nothing was done to injure them; it is now altered; now the rich are to be freed from taxes, &c., and the poor to be oppressed; never was there a time when, more than now, they needed protection.

On dividing, there appeared in favor of the Committee's rising 33—against it 54.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Mr. RUTLEDGE then moved that the resolution be referred to a select committee; he hoped his motion would prevail, if it should not, he should not regret having made it; that when this mania for ruin should be over, and the time should come for cool reflection, it might appear that attempts were made for stopping it.

Mr. GILES.—Gentlemen talk of warmth; he had not seen it; it is, however, natural for them to be warm; they were in the minority; but he did not wish the imputation of warmth thrown on himself.

Mr. BAYARD.—I acknowledge the gentleman has been cool, but he has said warm things; he has accused the last Government of an attachment to monarchy; he has talked much of royalty, Executive influence, &c. He may feel very cool himself when making these unfounded suggestions, but they are not calculated, nor do they appear intended to make others so.

Mr. DANA.—The gentleman says he is cool; I have observed he is usually so when employed, as he often is, in eulogizing himself and friends; he talks with all the coolness of self-complacency.

Mr. DENNIS.—Gentlemen have acknowledged the probability that the coining of copper, at least, may be profitable; why not, then, consent to refer to a select committee, who can make all necessary arrangements? It were curious, indeed, that a resolution to repeal should go to a committee to alter and revise. He had no predilection for the Mint Establishment; he believed, as it was now managed, it was expensive, and he doubted the propriety of continuing it without alterations; those alterations ought not to go to the coining of copper; for that would certainly be useful.

A motion was then made and seconded that the said resolution be referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereupon to the House.

On which motion the question being taken that the House do agree thereto, it passed in the negative—yeas 33, nays 54, as follows:

YEAS—James A. Bayard, Thos. Boude, John Campbell, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, John Dennis, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, William Barry Grove, Seth Hastings, Joseph Hemphill, Archibald Henderson, William H. And then the main question being put, that the House do agree to the said resolution, as reported from the Committee of the Whole House, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. GILES, Mr. MITCHELL, and Mr. HOLLAND, do prepare and bring in the same.

TUESDAY, February 9.

The House proceeded to the farther consideration of an engrossed bill to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," which was read the third time on the eighth instant: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, and that the title be, "An act to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage.'"

Mr. SPRIGG, from the committee to whom was referred, on the nineteenth ultimo, the petition of sundry inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia, made a report; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That it is expedient to pass a law incorporating a company for the purpose of opening a navigable canal, to connect the waters of the Potomac river with those of the Eastern Branch thereof, through Tiber creek, and the low lands at the foot of the Capitol Hill.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. SPRIGG, Mr. BRENT, and Mr. FOSTER, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. DAVENPORT, from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, presented a bill to continue in force "An act to augment the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned," which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and Comptroller of the Treasury, to the Commissioners appointed in pursuance of the act, entitled "An act, for the relief of the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia," enclosing certain documents relative to the claims of Elijah Ayer, deceased, and Elijah Ayer, junior, refugees from Nova Scotia; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the twenty-fifth ultimo, the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Caleb Eddy.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the eighth instant, the report of the committee appointed on the thirty-first of December last, on so much of the

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill making certain partial appropriations for the year one thousand eight hundred and two; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill for the relief of Samuel Harvey Howard, and other officers of the courts of Maryland; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, February 10.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were referred the memorials and petitions of sundry manufacturers of gunpowder, of hats, of types, of brushes, and of stone ware, within the United States, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the report of the Committee of Claims, of the twenty-seventh ultimo, to whom were referred the petition of John Carr, and two reports of committees thereon; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported their disagreement to the same.

Ordered, That the said report of the Committee of the whole House do lie on the table.

An engrossed bill making certain partial appropriations for the year one thousand eight hundred and two, was read the third time, and passed.

INTERNAL REVENUES.

Mr. DAVIS moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the several laws imposing duties on stills, and on domestic distilled spirits, refined sugar, licenses to retailers, sales at auction, pleasurable carriages, and on stamped vellum, parchment, and paper, ought to be repealed; and that the Committee of Ways and Means be, and they are hereby, instructed to report a bill conformably to this resolution."

Mr. DAVIS assigned as reasons for this motion, that the business, though long submitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, had not yet been reported upon, and the necessity of coming to an immediate decision.

Those opposed to the motion stated that it had been determined in that committee to repeal the internal revenues; that certain details in the repealing bill were not yet settled, but soon would be; and that of consequence no time would be gained by its adoption.

On the question, whether the House would take the above motion into consideration, it passed in the negative—yeas 40, nays 57, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, James A. Bayard, Phanuel Bishop, Thomas Boude, Robert Brown, William Butler, Samuel J. Cabell, John Campbell, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, John Condit, Thomas T. Upham, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, Peleg Wadsworth, Lemuel Williams, and Robert Williams.

Resolved, That the title be "An act to authorize the collection of fees due to the officers of the respective courts in the State of Maryland, from persons residing in the Territory of Columbia, by the Marshal of the said District."

THURSDAY, February 11.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from RICHARD SPRIGG, one of the members for the State of Maryland, containing his resignation of a seat in this House; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion, it was Ordered, That Mr. J. TALIAFERRO, Jr., be appointed of the committee "to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations or amendments may be necessary in the existing government and laws of the District of Columbia, and to report by bill, or otherwise," in the room of Mr. SPRIGG, who hath, this day, resigned his seat in the House.

Mr. DAVIS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a statement of goods, wares, and merchandises, exported from the United States, from the first of October, one thousand eight hundred, to the thirtieth of September, one thousand eight hundred and one, inclusive; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the settlement of the account of Samuel Dexter, for his expenses in defending against the suit of Joseph Hodgson," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments of the Senate; Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said amendments, together with the bill, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Ordered, That the memorial of Charles Pettit, of the city of Philadelphia, presented on the thirty-first of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, and the documents accompanying the same, be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

JOHN CARR.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Claims, of the twenty-seventh ultimo, on the petition of John Carr, to which the Committee of the whole House reported their disagreement on the 10th instant; and, the said report being twice read at the Clerk's table, in the words following, to wit:

"That they have duly considered the same, and have agreed to the report made by the Committee of Claims, at a former session of Congress, and which is herewith reported.

'The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John Carr, with the report of a select committee thereon, having examined and considered the same, report:

'That the petitioner seeks to obtain the pay and emoluments of a lieutenant, as if he had continued in the service of the United States till the end of the war.

'A particular statement of this gentleman's case is contained in a letter from the Accountant for the Department of War, which is subjoined, and to which the committee ask leave to refer, and pray that the same may be received as a part of this report.

'They are of opinion it would not now be expedient to re-settle accounts which have been, so long since, adjusted in the proper Departments, and by persons duly authorized; and, therefore, that the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted."

The question was taken that the House do concur with the Committee of the whole House in their disagreement to the same, and passed in the negative—yeas 32, nays 58, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, John Archer, Thomas Boude, Samuel J. Cabell, John Campbell, Matthew Clay, John Dawson, John Fowler, William B. And then the main question being put that the House do agree to the said report of the Committee of Claims, it was resolved in the affirmative, and so the said petition was rejected.

FRIDAY, February 12.

An engrossed bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States," was read the third time, and passed.

A petition of William Henry Harrison, John Gibson and others, trustees for establishing and founding an academy, called "The Jefferson Academy," at Vincennes, in the Indiana Territory, was presented to the House and read, praying that a donation of lands, to which the Indian title has been, or may be, extinguished, may be granted to the trustees of the said academy for the accommodation and benefit thereof, under the regulations therein specified.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. CUTLER, and Mr. CONDIT; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Speaker address a letter to the Executive of the State of Maryland, informing him of the resignation of RICHARD SPRIGG, one of the members of this House, of his seat in this House, in order that measures may be taken to supply the vacancy occasioned thereby.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to extend the privilege of franking letters to the delegate from the Mississippi Territory, and making provision for his compensation," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have, also, passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Lyon Lehman," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Ordered, That Mr. D. HEISTER be appointed to the committee to whom was referred, on the fifth instant, a motion, in the form of two resolutions of the House, "respecting the adjustment of the existing disputes between the Commissioners of the City of Washington and other persons who may conceive themselves injured by the several alterations made in the plan of the said city; also, relative to a plan of the said City of Washington, conformably, as nearly as may be, to the original design thereof, with certain exceptions," in the room of Mr. SPRIGG, who resigned his seat in the House on the eleventh instant.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee to whom had been referred the Message of the President of the 11th ultimo, and a resolution of the 5th instant, made a report which concluded with resolutions to the following effect:

"That, from the 1st of March next, the offices of two of the Commissioners of the City of Washington ought to be abolished, and all the duties of the commission be thereafter vested in one commissioner.

"That the accounts of the commission be settled with the accounting officer of the Treasury before the 1st of March.

"That such portion of city lots pledged for the repayment of loans made of Maryland, be annually sold, so as to meet accruing instalments, unless, in the opinion of the President, too great a sacrifice would thereby be made; in which case he is authorized to advance the sum needed from the public Treasury."

Referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The House took up the report of a select committee on the petition of McCashen and others, which involves the controversy respecting lands granted to John Cleves Symmes.

Mr. DAVIS made a brief statement of the facts attending the business; when, on motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, the report of the select committee was referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday week, in order to give time to the members to examine documents, and in other respects to make themselves acquainted with the case.

STATE BALANCES.

Mr. THOMAS called up his motion respecting State Balances, which is as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of extinguishing the claims of the United States for certain balances, which, by the Commissioners appointed to settle the accounts between the United States and the individual States, were reported to be due from several of the States to the United States, and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise."

Mr. TILLINGHAST moved to insert in the 7th line, after the words "United States," the words "and certain balances reported to be due from the United States to the individual States."

Mr. GRISWOLD observed that there were no such balances in existence—they had all been extinguished by being paid.

The amendment was lost without a division.

Mr. BAYARD hoped the resolution would prevail. The debtor States, not satisfied with the settlement made by the Board of Commissioners, had asked for information respecting the grounds on which it had been made. The information had been imperiously refused. In his opinion it was but right, if the debtor States did not dispute the validity of the debts due to the creditor States, that they should agree to expunge the claims against the debtor States. Indeed, he had been assured that the commission was not instituted with a view of sustaining any charges against the debtor States, but for ascertaining the amount due to the creditor States, and funding them; and he believed it had been so understood at the time. This was an affair not determinable by the ordinary rules applied to individual cases. Many of the States, not expecting a settlement, had kept no accounts or vouchers; and however great the supplies they contributed under such circumstances, they received no credits for them; while those States which had been most careful in the preservation of vouchers, shared a different and a better fate.

Mr. B. believed it was the true policy of the creditor States to agree to the extinguishment of these balances. He believed they never could be paid, because no State allowed them to be due. They would not, therefore, be paid voluntarily; and he knew of no force in the United States to compel payment. Why, then, keep up a source of irritation, which could do no possible good, and which could only tend to repel some States from that Constitution, which we all ought to endeavor to make the object of general affection?

Mr. SOUTHWARD said, he had yet heard no reason that convinced him that the resolution offered was just or proper. It would be recollected that this contract was made under the Confederation. In the establishment of our independence, great and various exertions had been made. In the contributions made, great inequalities took place, which were unavoidable. Generally, where the war existed, the States became creditor States. It was just that those States which had contributed more than their share should be repaid, and that those who had paid less should make up the deficiency. If the debtor States were not to pay their balances, why settle the accounts? To relinquish the payment would be, in his opinion, not only unjust but unconstitutional. The Constitution says, "All debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this Constitution, shall be as valid against the United States, under this Constitution as under the Confederation;" and the present Government had recognised those debts as just. The gentleman from Delaware says, the settlement is not just. But this was barely the suggestion of his own mind. To sustain it, he ought to have shown its defects; but this he had not done.

Mr. NICHOLSON said, the Constitution declares that engagements under the new Constitution shall be as valid as under the Confederation; that all the debts of the one should be paid by the other; but not, as the gentleman from New Jersey seemed to imply, that the United States should not release their debtors. We do not say, if we extinguish those balances, that we will destroy our moral obligation to pay what we owe, but that we will release those who are said to be indebted to us. Mr. N. believed the balances ought to be extinguished. To have enforced their payment when they were first declared to be due, might have hazarded the integrity of the Union; and he was persuaded that it would not be politic in the United States at any time hereafter to call for them. But the present motion goes no further than to appoint a committee to inquire into the expediency of extinguishing them, and he presumed that there would be no objection to making the inquiry.

Mr. MITCHELL was in favor of the resolution, as he believed a refusal to adopt it would be attended with unpleasant sensations. He judged so from an historical review of the business. The several States had associated together for their common defence, and, in the eye of equity, whatever that defence required, should constitute a common charge. The accounts of expenses thus incurred were not settled till the new Government was established. That Government fixed the mode of settlement; it appointed a board of referees, to report the debts and credits of the respective States. In this report, it was the fortune of certain States, notwithstanding the greatness of their contributions, to be reported debtor States. These States became debtors from the independent spirit with which they asserted their sovereign rights. Not relying on the general contributions, they furnished great supplies without making any charge to the Union; by exerting all their strength, they paid as they went, and preserved no vouchers of what they paid. This, he averred, was the case as to the State which he had the honor in part to represent; a State as willing as able to contribute, and which did contribute to a great extent; but which had neglected to preserve her vouchers, the preservation of which would have made her a creditor State. He believed, therefore, that in equity, the States were not bound to pay these balances. But to this it is replied, the award is final. He would not agree to that; he denied it. Besides, there was a want of coercive power in the United States to enforce those demands. From this consideration alone, we ought to proceed with lenity, and endeavor to make the settlement a peaceable one. As in other circumstances, we ought to make a virtue of necessity.

Mr. MITCHELL said, he had been told by a former Secretary of the Treasury, that this settlement was only intended as a record for the books of the Treasury, and never intended to be carried into execution as to the debtor States.

Mr. ELMER had no objection to the business going to a committee. But he would observe that it was considered at the time the board was formed, that, on a settlement, the debtor States should pay, and the creditor States be paid. On examining the journals of Congress, it would be found that payment had been actually pledged. It would be found, too, that the debtor States had gained greatly by the war. For instance, New York, which had such an extensive western territory, had gained more than New Jersey, which had none. Whatever may have been the secret understanding that the debtor States were not to pay, it was not so understood by the people of the United States.

It is said that there is no way of enforcing these balances; but that is no argument for striking them off altogether. Though they are now enforced, there may be future circumstances under which the States will be willing to pay them. New York had already done something, and he had no doubt other States would do something. Besides, no State in its sovereign capacity had applied for an extinguishment. There appeared, therefore, no propriety in proceeding to such a measure at this time. If a regard to harmony was pleaded, that was a strong argument. But, as yet, we had heard no murmur from the States.

Mr. S. SMITH said, he did not rise to take any part in the debate, but in order to bring the subject directly before the Committee. To do which, he moved so to amend the resolution as to make it read, "Resolved, That it is expedient to extinguish the claims," &c.

Mr. LOWNDES hoped the amendment would not be agreed to. He did not see the expediency of volunteering a relinquishment of the claims established against several of the States. The amendment was calculated to take the Committee by surprise. The original resolution went merely to consider the expediency of a relinquishment; the amendment involved the principle itself.

Gentlemen had gone into the merits of the main question. It was true, that all the States had been engaged in one common cause, and it was true the contribution should have been general. But it was known, that the old Government had not the power of obtaining money from the States in proportion to their capacity; its only mode was to recommend. It was known that some complied with the recommendation, and some did not. The great business, however, was effected. After which, to settle the accounts, a board was established, in which he believed each State was represented, which declared certain balances to be due. Objections are now urged because the proceedings of this board were not re-examined. But he would ask whether the debtor States would be satisfied with any result that brought them in debt? It was well known, that in private transactions, it was usual to submit the settlement of a controversy to a board of arbitrators, whose award was final.

Mr. L. supposed that this plan had been the result of accommodation. In consequence of it, certain States had been found debtor, which he presumed had not made proportionate advances. Surely, therefore, it was right they should pay. For these reasons he hoped the Committee would not be surprised into an adoption of the amendment. He had, however, no objection to refer the business generally to a select committee.

Mr. SMITH said, he had seconded the motion to amend, not because he was in favor of the motion as amended; for, on this subject, he thought with the gentleman from South Carolina. But he thought the principle ought to be settled in Committee of the Whole, and not in a select committee. That principle, he thought, was as well understood now as it ever could be. It lay within very narrow bounds. Will you forgive your just debts on the ground of generosity?

Mr. RUTLEDGE did not think the gentleman from Maryland had played the General to-day, though he often did so in that House. He had made a motion, as if he wished the debtor States discharged from their balances, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania had seconded the motion for the very opposite reason. He had believed that the sensibility of the debtor States would have induced the House to indulge them with a reference, which would produce a complete development of the business. He was willing to have got this information very fully; to this he had no objection, but he certainly felt strong objections to the amendment.

We are told, said Mr. R., that the tranquillity of the debtor States is disturbed by hanging up these debts in your statute books. But where was the evidence of this? The settlement had been made many years since, and no State had expressed any alarm at the prospect of the balances being paid. If any State had felt an alarm, why had not the members in this House been requested, and those in the other branch been instructed to pursue measures for getting rid of them. The gentlemen from Delaware and New York talk about the sensibility of the debtor States, and yet they tell you the States know they cannot be compelled to pay. He did not understand this kind of logic.

Mr. R. could not at present vote for a discharge of these balances. Circumstances may hereafter arise, which may induce the States to pay them. Formerly it had been said by a gentleman from New York, that that State would not pay a cent; and yet she had paid a million, which would otherwise have been paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

[Some gentlemen contested the sum paid by New York.]

Mr. RUTLEDGE resumed.—If not a million, yet certainly great payments had been made, and the States may find themselves, in peace or in war, in such a state, as to be benefited by paying these debts. They may be greatly benefited in discharging them by making roads, opening rivers, digging canals, and raising bridges. These improvements would be highly interesting to several of the States, and to New York in particular; and he believed the time would come when they would be willing to discharge the debts in this way, to enhance the value of their lands. These were his impressions. To the reference he had no objection. But he was not prepared in the present state of things, without any application from the States, to vote for releasing them.

Mr. HILL was desirous the amendment should not be made, not from any indisposition himself to agree to it, but from a regard to the sentiments of other gentlemen. Even if it was ascertained that these debts had arisen on a just consideration, yet, in his opinion, they ought to be extinguished, from the principle that, in our Government, whatever hazarded the harmony of the Union, ought to be avoided. Precedents were not wanting in which sacrifices were made to this principle. He alluded to the quieting the claims under Connecticut rights. But, whatever might be the general ideas on this subject elsewhere, he knew not a man in North Carolina, who did not believe the adjustment iniquitous. To show the Committee how the citizens of that State felt, he would state a case that had occurred before the Board of Commissioners. Two claims had been made, both for the same amount and the same description of supplies, one on one side and one on the other side, of Pedee river; one in North, and the other in South Carolina; and, in one case, seven shillings had been allowed, and in the other, only sixpence for the bushel of wheat. The business generally was entitled to the attention of Congress. It had, in fact, already been attended to at different times. New York had extinguished eight hundred thousand dollars of her balance under certain provisions applied to her case.

Gentlemen talk of the moral obligation to discharge these balances; but they go on the principle that these debts are established. This we deny. We say that in all contracts there are two parties, and that the United States saying it is a debt, does not make it so.

The gentleman from South Carolina enforces the propriety of all the States contributing for the general defence. We say we have contributed our full share. This subject had been before the last Congress. A report was made, but, owing to press of business, it was postponed. Mr. H. saw no reason for shutting the door of inquiry, and therefore, though he felt no hesitation to vote for the resolution as proposed to be amended, yet to indulge other gentlemen, he was in favor of a reference to a select committee.

Mr. DENNIS was against the amendment, as he wished the subject to go to a select committee, with a view of obtaining a detailed statement of all the information connected with it.

Mr. HOLLAND stated that the reason of North Carolina being a debtor State was, that she had preserved no vouchers of the operations of her militia. He was indifferent whether the subject was taken up directly or referred; but he was convinced it ought to be examined and elucidated. The public mind ought to be settled. Why hold it up in the present state? Is it that the General Government may gain a greater ascendancy over the States?

Mr. BACON said, if the object of the motion was to go into a new liquidation of the old accounts between the United States and the several States, it would not only take up every day of the present session, but the work would be left unfinished for our successors. These debts had been incurred in a common cause, in which each State was equally interested, and towards which each State was bound equally to contribute. When Congress made requisitions on this principle, they were accompanied by a promise that there should be a final liquidation. This liquidation was made; the settlement was complete. But this settlement is now objected to, and what is to be done? Why we must annul the contract. This might satisfy some of the States, but he was sure it would dissatisfy others. He saw, therefore, no end to be answered by the motion. We must either set aside all that had been done, and begin de novo, to which this body is incompetent, or rest satisfied with what is already done.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS observed, that since he had held a seat in the House, this subject had been almost every session called up. The more he had heard it discussed, the more he became convinced of the necessity of getting it out of the way. He found that whenever it was brought up, all was imagination. One State contended that it had contributed largely, and another, that its exertions had not been surpassed.

We are asked, why relinquish these balances before we are solicited by the States? He would reply that North Carolina never had recognised the debt, and, in his opinion, never would apply for its extinguishment. He was in favor of the amendment, because the principle ought to be decided here, and not in a select committee. What, indeed, could such committee report? There were no vouchers or books whereon the settlement had been made to be got at. All they could do, then, would be to report the balances alleged to be due, which any member could at any time learn.

It seemed almost useless to go into arguments to show the injustice of the claim, and of consequence, the justice of the resolution. It had been justly said, that those States which had contributed the most, had, by the report of the Commissioners, the most to pay; and this was peculiarly so with the State of North Carolina.

There were other considerations independent of those of justice, which recommended this measure. Had any way been pointed out in which these claims could be enforced? But, say gentlemen, some fortuitous events may happen that may induce the States to discharge these balances by building bridges, &c. But, inasmuch as these claims cannot be enforced, inasmuch as they rest upon no moral obligation; to continue to hold them up was to keep alive a perpetual source of irritation, not in the States, which felt too much indifference to be solicitous, but in this House—a source of irritation that involved a great waste of time and money.

Mr. W. had forborne to dwell on the injustice of these demands. But were he to enter on that branch of the discussion, he should say that the very act of destroying all the vouchers was of itself sufficient to justify any suspicion. He should say, that for what, in some States, there had been an allowance of one hundred pounds, North Carolina had not been allowed twenty shillings. Could, then, gentlemen talk of moral obligation, and say that this was a just debt?

Mr. T. MORRIS said, it was contended that the accounts should be opened anew and re-examined. The fears, therefore, of the gentleman from Massachusetts, were entirely visionary. The resolution was a simple one. It proposes to inquire into the expediency of doing away these debts. The amendment goes to determine the principle here. He thought it proper the principle should be settled here. But gentlemen say they want information. If so, after the amendment is agreed to, they may move for a postponement. If the amendment were carried, he would himself move a postponement.

It had been said that New York had had eight hundred thousand dollars of her debt remitted by the United States. But how did the case really stand? New York had availed herself of the act of Congress, not because she acknowledged the debt to be just, but because she preferred doing something to remaining in the situation towards the United States in which she stood. It was strange, then, to hear gentlemen say that New York had been favored. What was the fact? North Carolina, according to the gentleman, had not, and would not, pay one cent; and New York had discharged a greater sum than was due by all the other debtor States, with the exception of Delaware. She was, therefore, instead of being favored, placed in a worse situation than any other State. It was from the existence of this state of things that he wished a final decision to be made this session. New York having agreed to make certain payments to the United States, it was important to her to know whether the United States meant to enforce payment by the other States. Her situation would be truly unfortunate, if, after agreeing to pay, the United States suffered her claims against the other States to sleep. She would not only have to pay her quota of the debts, but would see no prospect of deriving her share of benefit from the payments of the other debtor States.

Mr. MACON said the subject was a very old one, which had occupied much time every session for many years, and he thought it would be as well to try the question now as at any other time. No information of a select committee could throw any new light upon it.

There was a fact which ought to have great weight with the Committee. One of the Commissioners who made the settlement, who was a member of this House, had, after the settlement, proposed a resolution to extinguish the balances of the debtor States; and he had stated, as a reason for this measure, that the principle adopted by the board had operated very harshly upon particular States. Mr. M. had it from authority not to be questioned, that in the settlement by the Commissioners, teams, with the usual number of horses, had not produced twenty shillings.

This subject had hung over our heads for eight years, and no scheme was yet devised for collecting the balances. How could they be collected? Congress had, it is true, authorized expenditures by the States in the erection of fortifications; but this very act was a tacit confession of the impracticability of getting the money into the public Treasury. As to a settlement with North Carolina, it was involved in great difficulty. In the act of cession of lands by that State to the United States, it was provided that the territory ceded should be pledged to pay a proportional share of the balance due the United States. How could that share be estimated?

Mr. M. regretted that this subject had been brought up. He should not himself have been for bringing it up, for he thought the claims of the United States not worth a rush. The truth was, the States had all exerted themselves in one great and common cause; they had done their best; they had acted with great glory. As to the State which he represented, he would ask if the first blood that had been spilled after that shed at Boston was not in North Carolina? and that was the blood of brother against brother. He desired not, however, to make comparisons, which were always unpleasant, but to show that North Carolina had no reason to shrink from an inquiry which would demonstrate that she had fully contributed her share in the common cause, without meaning to assert that she had done more than other States. Let, then, Congress decide at once, and abandon the claims altogether, or devise some plan for collecting them, that we may know how we stand.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that when he proposed the amendment before the Committee, he had assigned his reasons for it. He had observed that the debate went to the merits of the main question, and was apprehensive that, after spending the day in discussing it, we should at last take a vote, not on it, but on an incidental point. His object, therefore, was to bring the specific proposition before the Committee. I had, also, another motive. I wanted to spare the time of the Committee. This was my object. But the gentleman from South Carolina attributes to me a different motive. He considers me as interested so far as relates to Maryland. But that gentleman, it will be recollected, constantly checks other gentlemen in ascribing any motives to him, though it is scarcely possible, in the freedom of debate, to avoid occasionally noticing the motives of gentlemen. He should, therefore, on this point, be extremely cautious, while he will not suffer others to attribute motives to him, to refrain from attributing motives to them. The truth, however, was, that Maryland, though nominally a debtor State, was really a creditor State, and therefore whatever interest he felt from his relation to that State, would produce an effect the opposite of that ascribed to him.

The gentleman from South Carolina is also pleased to call me a General; he adds, however, that I have not on this, as on other occasions, played the General. I will tell that gentleman in reply, that, in Congress, I never think of playing the General. My object is always to go directly to the point, and though I am always disposed to give the gentleman credit for every good thing he says, yet I cannot do so on this occasion, as I recollect to have found the very same thing in a newspaper a day or two ago.

This question is of no importance to Maryland, but it is very important to the United States to come to a decision upon it. He thought it proper that the United States should relinquish these balances. It was also important, so far as it respected New York, whom he thought much injured, because, willing to comply with the law of Congress, she had paid liberally, while other States had paid nothing. Why continue the debtor States? Will it pay a shilling into your Treasury? No, it will only sour their minds towards the Union. Were there any mode of enforcing the payment of this debt, I should be for it, but there is no chance of it. I believe that every State in the Union exerted itself in our common cause. I believe that no State exerted itself more than another. We all fought together like brothers. Where there was danger we appeared, and wherever the enemy was we met him. There was not a field of battle in South Carolina where there were not to be found the blood and bones of Marylanders and citizens of other States.

Mr. RUTLEDGE said he was called up by the observations of the gentleman from North Carolina, who asks, with some force, and seems to place reliance upon the question, if gentlemen will not consent to review this settlement? He would answer, no. We cannot do it. The thing is impossible; the vouchers are destroyed; the materials for a new settlement do not exist: and they were properly destroyed. The settlement once made, they were useless.

The gentleman from Maryland, alluding to what I said respecting his being a General, says he cannot give me credit for my remark, as he had before seen it in a newspaper. Now, sir, I declare I never saw it in any newspaper; and I will assure that gentleman, I feel very sorry for it, as I think every article that relates to that gentleman well worthy my attention. Nay, I will seek for the newspaper, that I may see it. I do not, when I have anything to say, appear in the press, but I address myself to this House.

Mr. DANA said, I hope the amendment will not be agreed to. However gentlemen may be possessed of a wholesale intellect, that enables them to decide on interesting questions without a moment's reflection, I confess I am not blessed with so happy an intuition. I do not know that I have ever been called upon to form an opinion on this subject. As to a reference of it to a committee, I think their investigation may be useful, and after we get that, we may take time to decide. But now the plan is changed, and we are called upon to decide at once the principle. This mode of transacting business may be called an economy of time. You may give it the name, but it is not the substance. For my part, I desire to proceed according to our old plan, and go through the slow process of investigation. This is my way, and gentlemen may rest assured that this mode of hurrying business is not the way to save time, but to lose it.

Mr. BAYARD declared himself in favor of the amendment, and he could not think, notwithstanding the remarks of his honorable friend from Connecticut, that any gentleman in the House was unprepared to vote upon it. The subject had been frequently discussed, and he believed that the House was then as well prepared for a decision as they would be for a century to come. It involved but a single principle; and, as to information, he could scarcely tell what information was wanted. He felt much of the indifference of the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON.) He was sure the United States had neither the right, or the power to recover these balances; and he repeated it as his opinion, that it had not been the original intention that the debtor States should pay them. Will gentlemen recollect that the commission was instituted under the old Confederation. Had Congress, then, a right to do any thing to bind the sovereignties of the independent States? All they could do was to pass resolutions making requisitions, which the States might or might not comply with. They could appoint commissioners to settle the accounts, but could they impose the debts upon the States? No, they could not. It, therefore, never could have been contemplated that they would establish those debts. The only effect that could have been contemplated, was, that the creditor States might rely that, on a settlement, Congress would assume their balances.

Mr. B. said, though he thought, and others who had taken a view of the subject, thought, that these balances never could or would be recovered, yet others did not hold the same opinion. He alluded to those who were not competent to the taking an enlarged and correct view of the question. The opinion entertained by this description of citizens, however unimportant it might be in other States, was particularly detrimental to the State of Delaware. He believed that the apprehension that the balance allotted to Delaware would have to be paid, materially affected the value of property in that State. Mr. B. went, at considerable length, into the general merits of the question.

Mr. GRISWOLD said he wished the subject referred to a select committee, that it might be fully developed. The ideas of the gentleman from Delaware were certainly new, and which themselves required inquiry, though he believed the gentleman had overlooked several of the acts of the present Government. It would be found that in 1789, and in 1790, the board had been recognised. The acts of those years gave all the sanction to the measure that was proper to be given by the new Government; and he had supposed that the settlement made was final and conclusive. He had been heretofore inclined not to discharge the States from the payment of these balances. Yet he felt much disposed to attend to the ideas of gentlemen. It appeared that the prospect of a recovery was nearly desperate. He still, however, wished the whole subject to be investigated by a select committee, whose report would enable the House to arrive at a proper decision.

On the question being put, the amendment was lost—yeas 41, nays 46.

When the original resolution for referring to a select committee the consideration of the expediency of extinguishing the balances was carried.

Ordered, That Mr. THOMAS, Mr. BAYARD, Mr. DANA, Mr. HILL, and Mr. BUTLER, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

And the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 15.

A petition of sundry inhabitants of the county of Fairfield, in the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, was presented to the House and read, praying that the purchasers of lands formerly the property of the United States, in the said Territory, may be exonerated from the payment of interest which may have, or shall in future accrue on the amount of the principal, until the different instalments shall, respectively, become due; that the laws of Congress respecting the purchase and title of the lands aforesaid may be revised and amended; also, that two sections of land in each township, in the said county of Fairfield, may be granted as a donation for the purpose of encouraging seminaries of learning therein.

Ordered, That such parts of the said petition as relate to the payment of interest until the instalments of the principal shall, respectively, become due, and to a revision and amendment of the laws of Congress respecting the purchase and title of lands, in the said Territory, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Ordered, That the residue of the said petition do lie on the table.

A memorial of sundry merchants of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, praying relief in the case of depredations committed on the vessels and cargoes of the memorialists, while in pursuit of their lawful commerce, by the privateers of the French Republic, during the late European war.—Referred to the committee appointed on the fifth instant, to whom was referred a memorial of sundry citizens of the United States and resident merchants of the city of Baltimore, and State of Maryland, to the same effect.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act extending the privilege of franking letters to the Delegate from the Mississippi Territory, and making provision for his compensation." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendments.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, accompanying his report on the memorial and petition of Adam Tunno, and James Cox, and of Thomas Tunno, and John Price, of Charleston, in South Carolina, merchants and citizens of the United States, referred to him by order of the House, on the third instant; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Lyon Lehman:" Whereupon, Ordered, That the farther consideration of the said amendment be postponed until Monday, the first of March next.

Mr. WALKER, one of the members from the State of New York, presented to the House certain resolutions agreed to by the two branches of the Legislature of the said State, on the thirtieth ultimo, and the first instant, proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the choice of a President and Vice President; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FEARING, from the committee appointed on the twenty-sixth ultimo, presented a bill authorizing the conveyance of certain public lands within the Northwest Territory; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

JUDICIARY BILL.

Mr. DAVIS called for the order of the day on the Judiciary bill from the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD moved a postponement of this bill to the third Monday in March.

He said he made this motion, as it was not in the least important that the business should be taken up on the present day, whereas there were other objects which required an early attention. No object could so conveniently be postponed as this, as it was not to take effect till the first of July. It was, therefore, substantially the same thing whether the bill passed to-day or three weeks hence. Its passage now would not save a cent, or the sooner abolish the circuit courts.

On the other hand, great benefit might be derived from the postponement. It would afford time to discern the operation of the proposed measure on the public mind. On former occasions gentlemen had contended that the public impression should have its weight in this House; he hoped, therefore, on this occasion, they would not abandon their old principle.

For himself he had not been in the habit so frequently of applying to the public opinion as some gentlemen in the House, because few occasions had occurred so important as this. He did presume that those who consider this Government as the mere creature of the national will, will not object to the delay asked on purpose to collect that will. He knew that a great impression had been made on the public mind by the passage of this act in the other branch; he knew that the people in various quarters of the Union were preparing to tell us what they thought on the subject. Since this business had been before Congress it was impossible it could have been felt in all its importance, or contemplated in all its views in the remote portions of the Union. On this interesting point the public mind ought to be known; he wished it to be profoundly agitated; he wished to destroy all apathy where the vital principles of the Constitution were so deeply affected. For he believed if the Constitution were saved, it must be by the people.

Already a great deal of important business was before the House; business, and particularly that which respected the internal revenues, that claimed an early attention. We were told the people felt anxious for a repeal of those taxes; that they begin to think we are not sincere. It was therefore high time to take that subject up and decide it. He could mention many other interesting points that claimed an early attention.

Mr. RUTLEDGE said he had seconded the motion of postponement without intending to have troubled the House on it. But he was called up by the cry on the left for the question. Such a mode of procedure may comport with the system of gentlemen who are prepared on all occasions how to vote; but it was a course to him novel, and, he would say, to the nation extraordinary. He had hoped that on a question of such importance—on a subject infinitely more important than any ever before discussed within those walls—gentlemen would have honored the supporters of this motion with their reasons against it. Gentlemen may make light of this business, but the time will come, and shortly too, when they will feel the subject to be of importance. The people are thinking, deeply thinking, on it. Before he took his seat in that House, he did not hear that such a measure was contemplated; he did not believe that even in this wild season of innovation, so bold a measure would be attempted; the people had no idea of it until taken up in the Senate; and what was the effect? The moment they saw their rights affected they came forward with memorials against it. The respectable bar of Philadelphia had memorialized against it. The Legislature of Pennsylvania were of a different opinion.

To collect the public opinion, we ask the indulgence of a short time; no reasons are urged against our request; but the question is called for, and we are to be put down by the vote of a majority, by a silent vote. He begged gentlemen to overlook us, and to look at the nation. On former occasions gentlemen talked much of the people. On this occasion, when we wish a development of the public mind, they say no; and the question is called for. Are gentlemen for acting as on a former occasion? Do they think the minority have no rights? We had been told from high authority, that a minority has rights, has equal rights. He begged to know the meaning of the declaration; he supposed it meant we should have the right of debating.

If gentlemen are determined to have a silent vote, we shall deem it our duty to express our sentiments fully. They cannot expect a vote to-day or to-morrow. The subject is too important to be dismissed on a hasty consideration. If, then, the subject is of such a nature as necessarily to consume time, will not other important measures be neglected? The gentleman who had made the motion for going into a Committee of the Whole, had himself complained of the tardiness of the Committee of Ways and Means. Will not the discussion of this question, of such vast moment, still longer prevent the House from getting at the business confided to that Committee? whereas, if that be taken up now, it may be despatched in a short time.

Mr. GILES said he felt every degree of respect for the gentlemen, and he was persuaded they must be sensible that as far as gentlemen on his side of the House had gone they had treated them in a manner particularly respectful. He was still under the same impression, which alone induced him to oppose the motion for a postponement. When this bill came from the Senate, some gentlemen were for taking it up at an early day. This was alleged to be unexpected; a comparison of opinions took place, and the time for consideration was fixed, and, as he supposed, satisfactorily; this was the tenth day since the bill came from the Senate. Some gentlemen then thought three days sufficient for consideration; but ten days were asked, and granted. He then thought, and he still thought, the indulgence granted sufficient. It was true he had not replied to the remarks of the gentleman from Delaware, because he did not think a reply necessary, and that from a sentiment of respect to the whole House, whom he thought fully competent without any remark from him to decide whether they were then prepared to enter upon the discussion, after the subject had laid over for ten days. Yet we are told we are precipitating the business. He believed the indulgence granted was as great as was usual; and it will be found that the time now given is greater than that allowed the opponents of the bill when it passed. He referred to the Journals to prove that there was not then that forbearance that gentlemen now recommend.

Gentlemen seem to apprehend that this subject will be treated as one other has been, by a silent vote. Mr. G. hoped the House would proceed on it with calmness, dignity, and reflection. He viewed it as an all-important question, and from a respect to himself, to those associated with him, and to the nation, he would endeavor to present the most correct view he could take of it. And permit me to say, said Mr. G., that when subjects occur that require discussion in this House they will be discussed. But gentlemen go too far when they expect us to enter upon a discussion of propositions that require no examination. Such propositions had been made, when gentlemen requested information already in the possession of the House.

But gentlemen say this subject is recent; they had heard no mention of it before they took their seats in the House. Surely those gentlemen are not much in the habit of reading newspapers, or they would have seen that since March, 1800, it had occupied more of the public attention than any other subject. There was another circumstance that proved this step was not so unexpected as gentlemen say it is. Appointments had been made to the new offices under the system of individuals, who held places under the old, and who, from an expectation that this law would be repealed, had refused to accept them.

Gentlemen say they wish to agitate the public mind. I have no doubt they wish to agitate it. But I have no doubt, too, of their entire incompetency to raise alarm, because they are on the wrong side of the question. I have said that I wish to discuss this subject with calmness. This is still my wish. I wish to take it up free from all partiality or prejudice, and to examine it on its intrinsic merits. But it is not to be inferred from this that we fear the impression of the public sentiment on our side. I believe that sentiment is with us. A great majority of the Legislature of Pennsylvania has declared for a repeal of the law. North Carolina had instructed its Senators to the same effect before this discussion. Yet gentlemen say the subject had not been thought of, though two States had declared themselves in favor of the repeal, and Maryland had decided indirectly to the same effect. From these considerations, I should think it proper to delay the discussion no longer. I hope gentlemen will therefore agree to take up the subject, and enter upon an examination of it, not with a view to triumph, but to truth. If, after we have progressed, embarrassment should occur, or information be wanted, we can have no objection to a postponement.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—We ask for a postponement of this question, and gentlemen answer us, the day for discussion is fixed—it is the order of the day for this day. If this answer is sufficient in this case it is sufficient in every other. Do we not make bills the order for a certain day, but do we scarcely ever take them up on that day? Why, then, deviate from our ordinary rules? Are there not strong reasons for a postponement? First, much other business requires to be despatched. It is not contemplated that this law shall go into operation till the first of July. While therefore this is not, others are pressing. Why, then, take up this, and postpone them? Besides, is not the subject of vast importance—of more importance than any which ever came before this House? Why, then, deny time? Will not the discussion deeply involve the feelings? Are there not many honorable gentlemen who think that, by passing this bill, the Constitution is prostrated forever? Can gentlemen, after that, go on calmly discussing other business? Are not gentlemen then willing to postpone this question for the purpose of passing upon other subjects that involve no Constitutional question? Then, if they please, they can bring forward this bill, which, it was feared, would be the last act of the session.

Mr. DAVIS.—No gentleman on this floor would pay more respect to public opinion than I would. But I know the difficulty we experience here in ascertaining that sentiment. When in Philadelphia, where it was certainly more easy to acquire it, we had received memorials from ten thousand citizens, and this was called public opinion; but when the elections came on we found it was incorrect. I know no better way of ascertaining the public opinion, than through gentlemen who represent the several districts of the country. For my part, I know the sentiments of the State I represent. I know it to be in favor of the repeal. But gentlemen beg for more time before we adopt so bold a measure. To my knowledge so much time was not allowed when this law was carried. They require time for consideration. I presume that they who have passed the law have already considered it. Are gentlemen ready to say they passed it without consideration? We are told this is a bold measure. Permit me to say the passing the bill, and the mode of passing it, was a still bolder measure. Attempts were made to amend. But no; not a word was suffered to be added, though the bill was allowed to be defective. The honorable gentleman from Delaware wishes us to wait for an expression of the public opinion, and yet he tells us he will vote at last from the dictates of his own mind; from which I must infer that be the public opinion what it may, he will not listen to it.

Mr. RUTLEDGE was sorry gentlemen referred to newspapers for what was to be done here. They ask whether I have not seen this measure proposed in the newspapers? Yes; I have seen it proposed there. But I did not suppose that the wild projects of newspapers for prostrating the judiciary, for robbing the Senate of the treaty-making power, and other projects, were to be effected by us.

They say, too, as an evidence that this measure was expected, that district judges appointed under this law refused their new appointments through the fear of being driven from their seats by its repeal. But I will tell gentlemen that as to two of these judges, and I know of no other, the fact is not so. In the case of the judge of South Carolina, I know it is not so, from personal knowledge, and from good authority I know it not to be so in the case of the district judge of North Carolina. As to the instructions of North Carolina, I believe they were drawn from the attention of Congress being excited to the subject by the President.

Gentlemen say the law, now proposed to be repealed, was itself passed precipitately. But after it was proposed two sessions passed, at the end of one of which it was published for consideration, and taken home by the members, before it was finally enacted.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS said the resolutions of North Carolina passed on the 17th of December, and the communication of the President was made on the 6th of December. He was therefore warranted in saying the communication of the Executive had no effect on this measure.

If the business is so all important as gentlemen say, ought we not immediately to enter upon its discussion? But I never expected to hear such a warning in this House. Are we to be told that we are not only to dread the effects of the repeal of this law upon the nation, but that business cannot be transacted afterwards in this House? I disregard such threats, and I will say, with the gentleman from Delaware, that I will proceed, and pursue the dictates of my own mind.

Mr. DENNIS spoke in favor of the postponement to the same effect with the preceding speakers. In alluding to the act of the State of Maryland he said he did not know how it had become fashionable to consider the sentiments of the Legislature as synonymous with those of the people. He did not believe the opinion of the people in favor of the repeal. In the district he represented, their opinion was decidedly against it.

The gentleman from Kentucky says we had a full opportunity of investigating this question when the bill passed. But it is necessary to say that the Constitutional question involved in the repeal could not be involved in passing the law.

Mr. BAYARD.—I am bound to acknowledge my gratitude to the gentleman from Virginia for the respect he entertains for us, and in return I beg leave to tender him the homage of my high respect.

Gentlemen say we have been accommodated with a postponement according to our wishes, and that they had not expected any delay after this accommodation. I confess this was my expectation at the time. But this error arose from the bill then on our table being blank as to the time of its taking effect. I did not then know that its operation was not to take effect till the 1st of July.

Mr. B. did not believe the subject was in a state of maturation for decision. It was declared the new courts had no business—that the old ones were sufficient. But on what was this declaration founded? On Presidential information, in which several errors had been pointed out, and which was very incorrect. Besides, he believed the President had no right to obtain this information in the mode he had used, and the clerks of the courts were not bound to comply with the request of the Secretary of State. From his own personal knowledge, he knew the document to be incorrect, as far as related to his district, in which no chancery suits were stated to have been brought, whereas he had been engaged in several. This was an additional reason for further delay to get more accurate information.

Mr. HEMPHILL had always thought it was a rule in deliberative bodies, when a single member asked time for information to grant it, when no other business would be deranged by it. Besides, he felt himself in a peculiar situation. The Legislature of Pennsylvania was about instructing its representatives to vote for a repeal of the law of the last session. If the reasons they assigned should be satisfactory to him, he should vote for a repeal. He wished time to consider them.

Mr. SMILE said he believed the minds of the members were not to be made up by the talking of gentlemen, though they may think we stand in need of their instruction. At one circumstance he could not help expressing great pleasure. The people are now of some consequence. How often had he heard in that House the terms "sovereign people," pronounced with a sneer. But he thanked God the people were now acknowledged to be of some consequence. He had always thought the public opinion should be attended to, and if he thought that opinion against the repeal, he would not vote for it.

It was said the respectable bar of Pennsylvania had petitioned against the repeal, and great weight was attached to their sentiments. But who are these characters? Are they disinterested? Were they not lawyers, and did they not know the more courts the more business? But in opposition to their interested opinions were to be placed the sentiments of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, declared by a great majority of both Houses.

Mr. EUSTIS having been for the postponement until this day, could not sit silent under the imputation of precipitancy. The recollection of every gentleman must convince him of the extreme candor and fairness of the majority of the House. The gentleman from Delaware, when this business was first brought up, had asked for a postponement, and had said that if postponed to this day, he would be prepared to enter upon the discussion. He had been indulged in his request. This then is not our, but their measure; not our day, but their day. He must say the indulgence had proceeded from a very honorable and accommodating disposition, that called for a different return from that side.

Whatever was the ultimate disposition of the business, on which he felt not very solicitous, he thought it his duty to state these circumstances. Gentlemen, too, must see that this motion is perfectly fruitless, for whatever might be the real question before the House, the merits of the main question were sure to be discussed.

Mr. GODDARD was sorry any charge of precipitancy had been made. Yet he thought there were weighty circumstances that recommended a postponement. He had wished for a reference to a select committee, that should fully examine the subject. But this was refused. He now wished to avoid the Constitutional question. Gentlemen seem to think the Constitutional question the only one on which we can vote. He saw not this. Gentlemen will not surely, to establish a Constitutional question, repeal a law that is useful. He wished, then, to avoid the necessity of giving a legislative construction to the Constitution, as he feared deciding a question that will go greater lengths than gentlemen are aware of. He would wait for an expression of the public will whether the law was promotive of national good. If it appeared that it was, they might be willing to avoid the Constitutional question. They might agree to bury the hatchet as to that question, a decision of which may extremely agitate the public mind.

Gentlemen say we are afraid to meet the Constitutional question. I am, said Mr. G., afraid to meet it. It may perhaps be owing to the weakness of my nerves; but I feel as if I should be brought by it into a very unpleasant situation. Not because I have not made up my mind on the constitutionality of it, but from other motives.

Mr. GRISWOLD said he should not have again troubled the House, but for the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, who had said this is our day; but certainly he had mistaken the transaction. When the bill came from the Senate, we asked for a reference to a select committee to elude the Constitutional question. This was negatived. We then asked for delay. An early day was named. The gentleman from Kentucky had the generosity to name this day. It is not then our day, but their day.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, alluding to the memorial from the bar of Philadelphia, says they are mere lawyers, interested in what they pray for. But he would say that bar was elevated too high to be affected by anything that could fall from the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Their interest was directly the reverse of that ascribed to them. The fewer the courts the greater the delay, and the greater delay the more the business.

Mr. S. SMITH said he had now little hopes that the discussion of the main question would commence to-day, which was already too far gone to expect it. Still he hoped the motion of postponement would not prevail, so that the House might be prepared to enter upon the subject to-morrow. He agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts that this was emphatically their day. True it was, the gentleman from Kentucky had named it; but had not the gentleman from Delaware got up and solicited for this day, and declared that, if the indulgence were granted, he would feel it a duty to be prepared to go on with the subject with calmness, dignity, and deliberation?

I came to the House, therefore, said Mr. S., with this expectation, and I fully expected that gentleman would open the discussion. I came prepared to listen to him. Why? Because this is a subject on which I want information; and being one in which I could take but little share, I wished to profit by the ideas of ingenious gentlemen who may discuss it. Gentlemen now say they want information. Thence the necessity of commencing that discussion which is to give them information. They say they wish to remove all prejudices. Why not, then, openly and boldly eradicate them? The gentleman from Delaware had told us he would obey the public will; and he adds, if the bill passed it will prostrate the Constitution. Will he, then, if the public will shall appear to be for a repeal, vote for it? I am inclined to think the gentleman went further than he intended when he made this declaration. The information gentlemen say they want can have no effect upon those who have made up their minds upon the Constitutional question, for I cannot believe they would violate their oaths to conform to the public will. Is it to operate upon us? No; for we are ready to act—to say we have heard the public voice, and are prepared to obey it.

Mr. HOLLAND spoke against the postponement. After assigning his reasons at some length, he proceeded:—Why, then, wait? For the single reason offered by the gentleman from Connecticut, viz: his wanting to avoid the Constitutional question; did he not mean by this to delay, to embarrass, and perhaps defeat the bill? Give me leave to say, said Mr. H., I do want to meet it, and to get rid of it, that we may proceed to other business.

Mr. DANA.—The gentleman from North Carolina need not to have told us he meant not to compliment us. We might have learned that from his conversation. But I wish to know what authorizes him to make these charges? My colleague has said he did not wish to meet the Constitutional question. But has he said he meant to procrastinate, to embarrass, to defeat it? Is that gentleman so much in the habit of expediting business as to be authorized to make these charges? I acknowledge that my mind recoils at the decision of the Constitutional question, because I deprecate the result, if decided in one way. My mind recoils, because it goes to shake the foundations of society; because it shakes questions that I thought were fixed, and which were not to be discussed; because if decided one way, we shall be sent back to the first principles of society. The gentleman cannot tell why we are for delay. The gentleman from Massachusetts is a scholar. He may appreciate my remarks, if others cannot. We want information—that information which flows from books—he, having enriched his mind with the stores of knowledge, knows its value. Can any man show me a library, public or private, where I can get this information? We labor here under peculiar disadvantages. But it is probable that gentlemen, after representing their civility to us, will at last vote us down.

Mr. GODDARD explained what he had previously said.

Mr. BAYARD.—It is my misfortune to be perpetually misunderstood by the gentleman from Maryland. I am at a loss to know how gentlemen on this side are more misunderstood by him than any other member. Is it that his anxiety to answer us induces him to state fallacies in order that he may refute them? He says, I stated that I would come perfectly prepared to-day. I did not say we would come forward to discuss the subject. The same gentleman charged me with saying I would instruct the House. This is impossible. It might be compatible with the character of that gentleman, but I never could say so.

The gentleman has also charged me with saying I would vote for the repeal, if the public will was for it. I said not so. I did say the Constitution was the property of the people; that the majority had a right to construe it as they pleased; and that I would obey their construction, that is, I would bow to what appeared manifestly the sense of the majority. The gentleman from Massachusetts had said this is our day. Perhaps, it is emphatically our day—perhaps our last day. I have no doubt gentlemen would be gratified if it were our last day.

The fact is, when an unprecedented precipitation was attempted, I agreed to this day, because I could not expect a longer day would be granted. It was, however, as much a forced day, as any other day could have been. As to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, it was painful for strangers to be obliged to defend the friends of that gentleman from reflection. But I will say to that gentleman there was no ground of fact to justify his aspersion. He had charged his political friends with having apostatized—with having renounced their party—with having violated their political faith.

Mr. SMILIE said he had said no such thing.

Mr. BAYARD was glad the gentleman knew what he did say, which was an unusual thing. I understood him to say they acted from interested motives. I drew the inference. If governed by interest, I ask whether they are not apostates; whether they have not renounced their political creed? Could anything be more base, on a question involving Constitutional grounds, than to be governed by motives the most wretched and contemptible?

The question of postponement was then taken by yeas and nays; which were—yeas 35, nays 61, as follows:

Motion to adjourn. Lost—yeas 37.

Mr. DENNIS moved a postponement till Monday next.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—I will state as briefly as possible the motives which influence me to be against the postponement moved by the gentleman from Maryland. I am sensible his motives for a postponement may be pure. I believe they are pure. But when I compare the reasons of the friends of the postponement, and find them so various and irreconcilable, I can discover no reason for gratifying their request. One gentleman says he wants information of the state of the public will. Another gentleman says it is a great Constitutional question, and whatever may be the public opinion, he must vote from the dictates of his own judgment. Another gentleman wishes to understand the resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, by which he may perhaps be governed. Another gentleman says the legislative vote is no indication of the public mind. Gentlemen say their reasons are cogent; but I beg them to tell me on which of their various and contradictory reasons they mean to vote for a postponement—reasons so irreconcilable that if one was correct the others must be false.

I should not have risen now, but from seeing the day nearly gone, and from being prepared for a reiteration of motions that will consume the whole of it.

Other reasons are urged. We are told the great Constitutional question may be evaded. When I say so, I do not mean to impute to gentlemen any disposition to embarrass the discussion, but a disposition to shrink from a question which they say will give a stab to the Constitution. Believing as they do, I think the fear an honorable fear. But thinking differently myself, it becomes me to speak differently. It becomes me to declare that this is a great Constitutional question that ought to be decided, and decided soon. It ought not to be left till the public mind shall be acted upon incorrectly—till some twenty or thirty years hence it shall be operated upon by war, by intrigue, or by improper excitement. When I see all the dangerous motives, such as war without and treason within, which too frequently operate, and compare the state of the country under their influence, with its present situation, entirely free from them, I say this is the period for decision. For decided it must be. I feel for gentlemen, whose correct disposition it is to shrink from a question whose result must be adverse to them. I have been in the same situation. I, like them, have shrunk from some questions. But did they wait for me, till their power was taken from them? According to this course, no decision can take place but that which conforms to the fears of a minority.

I recollect an eloquent member of this House from Massachusetts having deprecated indecision as the worst of all decisions. The saying was paradoxical, but the doctrine was sound. I wish the Constitution settled, that it may be no longer afloat. I wish the nation to settle it, that all further discussion may be removed. I wish to know whether the Judiciary is a co-ordinate or a paramount department of Government.

We have heard much on the points of constitutionality and expediency. All these considerations belong in strictness to that state when the bill shall be taken up, and not to that state when the only question is, shall the bill be taken into consideration? But as gentlemen have reiterated their objections on the point of expediency, and in supporting those objections have taken only one ground, I hope I shall be indulged in stating that the very reasons of the gentlemen on that ground would govern me in making a different decision. They tell us that by the bill we propose to repeal justice is brought home to every man's door. But the House will please to recollect that we are not to decide whether justice shall be brought home to every man's door; this is not the exclusive legislature to which this only belongs. It belongs to the States, and I will say, if they do not perform their duty, this House cannot assume the performance of it. The Constitution never intended it, and this bill does not accomplish it; because while the large States, under the State governments, are subdivided into twenty districts, this law only divides them into two. Nor is it necessary under our law that there should be this subdivision, because the Federal authority of the courts does not extend to cases between man and man, or to those ordinary cases that require that justice should be brought to the door of every citizen. So long as Federal courts exist, to which there may be an appeal or removal; so long as the States are prevented from emitting paper currencies; so long as one part of the Union is prohibited from cheating its neighbors; so long as the foreigner has an impartial tribunal to appeal to, the Constitution is satisfied. This it is for which the Constitution was made, and that which makes the gentleman from Connecticut vote against the repeal of this act, makes me for it. I mean in connexion with other motives.

These are my reasons for opposing the motion. The question of repeal is a great Constitutional question, and we must settle it. It is a question that will be agitated so long as we remain a nation, until it shall be decided, and this is the only tribunal before which it can be decided.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

Mr. DENNIS rose to explain what he said about the will of the people being evinced in the votes of their Legislature. He did not say that this was altogether to be disregarded, but he had some reason to believe that in the State of Maryland, the people did generally approve of the act in debate which passed that State. What criterion of the public will was the votes of a State on a particular question about which, at the time of election, the candidate was not questioned as to his opinion? None. When this Legislature was elected, Mr. D. did not suppose there was a citizen of Maryland who supposed this question would have been agitated. How often were Congress told that the Alien and Sedition bills were contrary to the will of the great majority of the people of the United States? and yet those bills were passed. A good proof that it was not then the opinion of the gentlemen that the Legislative acts were criterions of the public will.

Mr. NICHOLSON had no doubt but a majority of the people of Maryland would approve of this repealing law. What evidence could his colleague (Mr. DENNIS) have to the contrary? He believed that the gentleman spoke the truth when he said that the people would not approve of it in the district he represented, but that could by no means be a criterion by which to judge of the whole State: that was yet to be tried. In a Government like ours, depending upon the popular will for its support, it were to be wished that this popular will could be accurately collected on every important question, previous to the discussion of the Legislature. If it could be, he would be willing to modify his vote by that will. From present impressions, he had no doubt but the popular will would operate in favor of the bill under consideration, and against the new system. He knew of no way to obtain that will better than it could be known by the representatives immediately from the people; and even waiting till March would not evince that will with more accuracy than it was now known, although even 50,000 people should petition the Legislature. He referred to a period in the British history when a petition from 80,000 people was presented to Parliament against a certain measure, and yet it was said not to be the popular will. If they could by any means obtain the popular will, Mr. N. declared himself willing to sit here six, eight, or ten months to await it; but as they could not, the responsibility must rest on the persons who gave their votes. He was perfectly willing that the public eye should observe his conduct, uninformed as it appears to some gentlemen to be.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, and the motion of postponement lost—yeas 34, nays 58.

YEAS—James A. Bayard, Thomas Boude, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, John Dennis, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, William Barry Grove, Seth Hastings, Joseph Hemphill, Archibald Henderson, William H. Hill, Benjamin Hunger, Thomas Lowndes, Ebenezer Mattoon, Lewis R.

Mr. GILES moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RUTLEDGE moved an adjournment. Lost, yeas 38, nays 44.

Mr. GILES's motion was then agreed to, and the House went into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. J. C. SMITH in the Chair.

The Committee then rose, and asked leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, February 16.

A representation of sundry merchants and traders of the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, was presented to the House and read, praying that an act of Congress, passed on the thirteenth of February, one thousand eight hundred and one, entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the Courts of the United States," may be continued in force; or that, if it shall be deemed expedient by Congress to repeal the provision of the said act in relation to the general establishment of the courts therein mentioned, the said repeal may not extend to the courts of the third circuit of the United States, for the reasons specified in the said representation.

Also, a memorial of the Corporation of the Chamber of Commerce of the City of New York, praying that this House will not pass into a law a bill sent from the Senate, and now depending before the House, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes."

Ordered, That the said representation and memorials be referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the fourth instant, the bill from the Senate last mentioned.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendment reported on the fourth instant, from the Committee of the whole House, to the bill for the relief of Daniel W. Coxe and others; and, having made a farther progress therein, the further consideration was postponed till to-morrow.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Judiciary bill from the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON.—I should not rise to offer my opinion on the great question before the Committee, were I not placed in a situation different from that in which I have been since I have had the honor of a seat in this House. The Legislature of the State of North Carolina, one of whose representatives I am on this floor, have seen proper to instruct their Senators and to recommend to their Representatives in Congress, to use their exertions to procure a repeal of the law passed the last session of Congress, for the more convenient organization of the Courts of the United States, and the bill on your table has for its object the repeal of this law, and as I shall probably vote against its passage, a decent respect for the opinions of those who have framed and sent forward those resolutions, demand that I should give the reasons which influence my conduct.

And here, sir, I cannot forbear lamenting extremely that I should unfortunately be placed in a situation where the highest obligations of duty compel me to act in opposition to the wishes of that community to which I immediately belong. It is certainly of great importance that, as public functionaries, we should not only discharge those trusts committed to us with fidelity, and for the general good, but in such a manner as to give satisfaction to those for whom we are acting.

And if I know the feelings of my own heart, I declare that, next to the consciousness of having performed my duty with uprightness, my highest satisfaction is the knowledge that in the discharge of this duty I meet the approbation of my fellow-men. But, sir, if this approbation is only to be obtained by the unconditional surrender of my understanding, and the violation of my oath, I hope I shall be excused if I do not make this sacrifice at the altar of public opinion. Indeed, sir, were I disposed to forego my own opinion, and adopt that of the Legislature of my own State—were I inclined to say, they will be done, and not mine, I should first demand of them an absolution from the oath which I have taken to support the Constitution of the United States. As long as that oath is binding on me, I see an insuperable objection to my acting in conformity to their wishes.

I will further remark, sir, that I am not a little surprised that that august body should have undertaken to decide on a question not necessarily before them, without having an opportunity of hearing the arguments which may be used here, either on one side or the other. I will not permit myself for a moment to believe the measure originated in a want of confidence in those who represent the State and the people in this Assembly. And yet, if that confidence exists, the reasons for this procedure do not immediately present themselves to the mind.

I hope, sir, it will not be understood that I mean to cast the most distant shade of disrespect on that body. I feel too great a respect for the Legislature of my native State to be guilty of such an attempt. No doubt but that they were influenced by the purest and most correct understanding. It does not follow, by any means, that because my weak and feeble mind cannot discover perfect propriety in the conduct of men, that therefore it does not exist.

Having premised thus much, Mr. Chairman, I will proceed to an examination of the question under consideration. It has been usual to divide it into two parts: first, the expediency; and, secondly, the authority of Congress to pass the law on the table. This is a natural and correct division; but I shall invert the order of considering the question, and first examine our power to act, before we consider the expediency of acting. And if, after a calm and candid review of the Constitution, it should be found that we are prohibited from passing the bill, there will be no necessity for inquiring into the expediency of repealing the law passed at the last session of Congress for organizing our courts of justice. The relative merits of the old and new Judiciary system will be entirely out of view. For I am confident that there is not a member of this body who would wish to pass the bill on your table, if in doing it we must violate the sacred charter under which we are now assembled.

The people of America have obtained and established that the powers of Government shall be vested in three great departments: the Legislative, the Executive, and the Judicial. They have said that there shall be a House of Representatives, the members of which shall be chosen by the people of the several States every second year. Though this House is composed of members chosen by the people immediately; though they can have no other interest than the great community from which they were sent; though they must return to the common mass in the short period of two years; yet enlightened America did not see proper to entrust the power of making laws to this body alone; they knew that the history of man, and the experience of ages, bore testimony against the safety of committing this high power to any one Assembly not checked by any other body. They have therefore erected another branch of the Legislature, called the Senate, the members of which are not to be elected by the people immediately, but by the sovereignties of the several States; they are to be chosen for six years, and not for two; and the qualifications requisite to entitle those to a seat is different from that of a member of this House. To these bodies are given the power of initiating all laws; but after a bill has passed both of these Houses, before it becomes of binding obligation on the nation, it must be approved of by the President; it is a dead letter, until life is given by the Executive. The President is elected not by the people, not by the Legislatures of the several States, not by either House of Congress, but by Electors chosen by the people. He is to hold his office during four years. This is the second great department of the Government. It will be easily discovered from this cursory view of our Constitution, the caution and jealousy with which the people have conferred the power of making laws, of commanding what is right, and prohibiting what is wrong. But, sir, after this law was made, after its authoritative mandate was acknowledged by the nation, it became necessary to establish some tribunal to judge of the extent and obligation of this law. The people did not see proper to entrust this power of judging of the meaning of their laws, either to the Legislative or to the Executive, because they participated in the making of these laws; and experience had shown that it is essential for the preservation of liberty that the Judicial and Legislative authorities should be kept separate and distinct. They therefore enacted a third department, called the Judicial, and said that "the Judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges both of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

It is admitted, I understand, by all parties, by every description of persons, that these words, "shall hold their offices during good behaviour," are intended as a limitation of power. The question is, what power is thus to be limited and checked? I answer, that all and every power which would have had the authority of impairing the tenure by which the judges hold their offices, (if these words were not inserted,) is checked and limited by these words; whether that power should be found to reside in Congress, or in the Executive. These words are broad and extensive in their signification, and can only be satisfied by being construed to control the Legislative as well as the Executive power. But gentlemen contend that they must be confined to limiting the power of the President. I ask gentlemen, what is there in the Constitution to prove their signification to this end alone? When you erect a court and fill it with a judge, and tell him in plain, simple language, that he shall hold his office during good behaviour, or as long as he shall behave well; what, I beseech you, sir, will any man, whose mind is not bewildered in the mazes of modern metaphysics, infer from the declaration? Certainly that the office will not be taken from him until he misbehaves; nor that he will be taken from the office during his good behaviour. Under this impression he enters upon his duty, performing it with the most perfect satisfaction to all persons who have business before him; and the Legislature, without whispering a complaint, abolishes the office and thereby turns out the judge. The judge is told this is no violation of the compact; although you have behaved well, although we have promised that as long as you did behave well you should continue in office, yet, there is now no further necessity for your services, and you may retire. These words, "during good behaviour," are intended to prevent the President from dismissing you from office, and not the Legislature from destroying your office. Do you suppose, sir, that there is a man of common understanding in the nation, whose mind is not alive to the influence of party spirit, that would yield his assent to this reasoning? I hope and believe there is not. But, sir, how is it proved that the President would have had the power of removing the judges from their office, if these words, "during good behaviour," had not been inserted in the Constitution? Is there any words in that instrument which gives the President expressly the power of removing any officer at pleasure? If there are, I call upon gentlemen to point them out; it does not result from the fashionable axiom, that the power which can create can destroy. The President can nominate, but he can appoint to office only by the advice and consent of the Senate. Therefore, it would follow, if the power of displacing results from that of creating, that the Senate should participate in displacing as well as creating officers. But however this may be, it is certainly a mere constructive power which he has exercised, because the Legislature have, from motives of expediency, acknowledged that he had it. If the Constitution does not necessarily give the President the right of removing officers at pleasure, and if that right depend upon Legislative acts or constructions, where would have been the necessity for inserting these emphatic words as a check and limitation of Executive power, where without them the President has no such power? You are taking great pains to control a power which does not exist. The persons who framed our Constitution knew that a power of removal in ordinary cases must exist somewhere. They took care, therefore, that in whatever hands it might fall, the language of the Constitution respecting the tenure of the office of a judge should be co-extensive with the whole power of removal, whether it should reside in one or in more hands.

But, sir, these words, "during good behaviour," are familiar to the American people. When the political bands which united us with Great Britain were burst asunder, and we assumed among the nations of the earth an independent station, most, if not all the States introduced these words into their constitutions. They were deemed essential, and a meaning has been stamped upon them which it is not in the power of this House to change. Let us for a moment examine some of the State constitutions, and see what signification must of necessity be given to these words. I will first advert to the Constitution of North Carolina, as being one with which I am best acquainted. In that instrument it is said, "that the General Assembly shall, by joint ballot of both Houses, appoint judges of the supreme court of law and equity, judges of admiralty, and an attorney-general, who shall be commissioned by the Governor, and hold their offices during good behaviour." I ask gentlemen what power is intended here to be limited and checked by the words "shall hold their offices during good behaviour?" Not the Executive, for it is well known that the Gov-error of that State cannot appoint even a constable. It could not be the meaning of that constitution to check his power of removal, for that of appointment is not anywhere given to him. Then these words must mean, that the Legislature should not have the power of removing the judges from office as long as they behaved well. If you do not give this signification to the words, they are of no importance, and might as well have been left out of the instrument. I hope the feelings of the people of North Carolina will not be hurt, and their understandings insulted, by telling us that the meaning of the words may be satisfied by construing them to extend to a prohibition of the Legislature displacing the judges, and proceeding to the election of others, without those displaced being guilty of misbehaviour. If this is correct, what security, sir, have the people then for the independence of their judges? The Constitution has told them that they should be judged by men who, during the time they behaved well, should continue in office, or what is the same thing, should hold them during good behaviour. But they are now informed that this was intended to operate as a check upon the Legislature's displacing them by selecting others to fill their offices when they had not misbehaved, but not to prevent their passing a law repealing that act by which the appointment to office was made; or in other words, our Assembly are expressly forbidden to impair the tenure by which our judges hold their offices, as long as they behave well; but they can repeal the law, and the judges are out of office, though they may be the most virtuous, upright, and able men in the country, and have discharged their duties faithfully. Are the gentlemen on this floor from North Carolina prepared to give this construction to that constitution? Are they prepared to tell their constituents that the provisions of their constitution may be thus evaded, and the whole power of Government, Legislative, Executive and Judicial, be concentrated in the General Assembly, and absolute despotism imposed upon them? If they are not, I conjure them to pause before they give their vote for the passage of the bill on the table. I will further observe, Mr. Chairman, that words of the same import with those I have quoted from the Constitution of North Carolina, are to be found in the Virginia and South Carolina constitutions, in neither of which States hath the Governor the right of appointing judges.

In Virginia, sir, the judges of the supreme court, in 1792, declared that the Assembly of that State had not the power of imposing chancery duties on the district judge, and in delivering their opinions descanted at large on the independence of the judiciary, and said that the Assembly could not annihilate the office of a judge, which was secured to him by the constitution. If this is a true exposition of the constitution of that State, I ask gentlemen by what authority they now attempt to impose a different meaning on the same words, when found in the Constitution of the United States? Are we to suppose that the whole people of America were less regardful for their rights, less solicitous for independent judges, than the people of a particular State? And unless this is conceded, the doctrine of gentlemen who advocate the passage of this bill must be incorrect.

But it has been said that the powers of each Congress are equal, and that a subsequent Legislature can repeal the acts of a former; and as this law was passed by the last Congress, we have the same power to repeal it which they had to enact it. This objection is more plausible than solid. It is not contended by us that legislatures who are not limited in their powers have not the same authority. The question is not what omnipotent Assemblies can do, but what we can do under a Constitution defining and limiting with accuracy the extent and boundaries of our authority. The very section in the Constitution (sec. third, art. first) which I have read, is a proof against the power of every Congress to repeal the acts of their predecessors. In the latter part of the eighth section it is proposed that the judges shall receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office; and yet the salary was ascertained and fixed by a former Congress. The same observations may be made with respect to compensation for the President, which can neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected. It is not competent for this Congress to vary the compensation to him which has been fixed by a prior Legislature. It is clearly seen, upon a little investigation, that the position which gentlemen take is too extensive, and leads immediately to a destruction of the Constitution. It does away all check, and makes the Legislature omnipotent. It has been asked, that if a corrupt and unprincipled Congress should make an army of judges, have not a subsequent Congress the right of repealing the law establishing this monstrous judicial system? I answer that they have not; the same mode of reasoning which attempts to prove this right from an abuse of power will also prove that you may lessen the compensation of your judges. May not equal oppression be imposed upon the people by giving your judges exorbitant salaries as by increasing their numbers? May not the same corrupt and unprincipled motive which would lead men to the raising of an army of judges lead them to squander the public money? And may they not, instead of giving their judges two thousand dollars a year, give them two hundred thousand? And yet, sir, if it were to take place, I know of no authority under the Constitution to lessen that exorbitant compensation. The Government of our country is predicated upon a reasonable confidence in those who administer our public affairs. They must have the power of acting for the public welfare, and this would never have been given them if the possible abuse of this power were a sufficient reason for withholding it.

I will take the liberty of observing further, that this part of the Constitution, which forbids lessening the compensation to the judges during their continuance in office, furnishes a strong argument that it was the intention of the people to place their judges out of the control of the Legislature as long as they behaved well; that they did mean to render them independent of the Legislature to a certain extent, is obvious, inasmuch as they inhibit the power of reducing their salaries. For it is evident, that if they could take from them their compensation, they might drive them from office, and the consequence would have been, that our judges would have felt all the dependence which results from a consciousness that another body has the power of diminishing their comforts. I ask gentlemen if the framers of this Constitution intended to give Congress the power of abolishing the office of a judge, by repealing the law which created the office, and thereby displace the judge, where could have been the propriety of forbidding his salary to be diminished during his continuance in office?

Is it possible to suppose that they were more anxious to secure that independence which results from permanency of compensation, than that which results from permanency of the office itself? That they should have been altogether regardless of the power which Congress was to have over the office, but limit with the utmost strictness their power of diminishing the salary, when the office itself, upon which the salary depends, was to be at the mercy of Congress? I believe that such folly cannot, with justice, be attributed to those great men who gave existence to this instrument.

Again, sir, the construction which gentlemen on the other side of the House contend for, tends to the concentration of Legislative and Executive powers in the same hands. If Congress, who have the power of making laws, can also displace their judges by repealing that which creates the offices they fill, the irresistible consequence is, that whatever law is passed the judges must carry into execution, or they will be turned out of office. It is of little importance to the people of this country whether Congress sit in judgment upon their laws themselves, or whether they sit in judgment upon those who are appointed for that purpose. It amounts to the same despotism; they in fact judge the extent and obligations of their own statutes by having those in their power who are placed on the sacred seat of justice. Whatever the Legislature declares to be law must be obeyed. The Constitutional check which the judges were to be on the Legislature is completely done away. They may pass ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, suspend the writ of habeas corpus in time of peace, and the judge who dares to question their authority is to be hurled from his seat. All the ramparts which the Constitution has erected around the liberties of the people, are prostrated at one blow by the passage of this law. The monstrous and unheard of doctrine which has been lately advanced, that the judges have not the right of declaring unconstitutional laws void, will be put into practice by the adoption of this measure. New offences may be created by law. Associations and combinations may be declared treason, and the affrighted and appalled citizen may in vain seek refuge in the independence of your courts. In vain may he hold out the Constitution and deny the authority of Congress to pass a law of such undefined signification, and call upon the judges to protect him; he will be told that the opinion of Congress now is, that we have no right to judge of their authority; this will be the consequence of concentrating Judicial and Legislative power in the same hands. It is the very definition of tyranny, and wherever you find it, the people are slaves, whether they call their Government a Monarchy, Republic, or Democracy.

Mr. Chairman, I see, or think I see, in this attempt, that spirit of innovation which has prostrated before it a great part of the old world—every institution which the wisdom and experience of ages had reared up for the benefit of man. A spirit which has rode in the whirlwind and directed the storm, to the destruction of the fairest portion of Europe; which has swept before it every vestige of law, religion, morality, and rational government; which has brought twenty millions of people at the feet of one, and compelled them to seek refuge from their complicated miseries in the calm of despotism. It is against the influence of this tremendous spirit that I wish to raise my voice, and exert my powers, weak and feeble as they are. I fear, sir, on the seventh of December, it made its appearance within these walls, clothed in a gigantic body, impatient for action. I fear it has already begun to exert its all-devouring energy. Have you a judiciary system extending over this immense country, matured by the wisdom of your ablest and best men? It must be destroyed. Have you taxes which have been laid since the commencement of the Government? And is the irritation consequent upon the laying of taxes worn off? Are they paid exclusively by the wealthy and the luxurious part of the community? And are they pledged for the payment of the public debt? They must be abolished. Have you a Mint establishment, which is not only essentially necessary to protect the country against the influx of base foreign metals, but is a splendid attribute of sovereignty? It must be abolished. Have you laws which require foreigners coming to your country to go through a probationary state, by which their habits, their morals, and propensities may be known, before they are admitted to all the rights of native Americans? They must be repealed, and our shores crowded with the outcasts of society, lest oppressed humanity then should find no asylum on this globe!

Mr. Chairman, if the doctrine contended for by gentlemen on the other side of the House should become the settled construction of the Constitution, and enlightened America acquiesce with that construction, I declare for myself, and for myself alone, I would not heave a sigh nor shed a tear over its total desolation. The wound you are about to give it will be mortal; it may languish out a miserable existence for a few years, but it will surely die. It will neither serve to protect its friends nor defend itself from the omnipotent energies of its enemies. Better at once to bury it with all our hopes.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS said he could not believe it necessary in the discussion of this question, which he acknowledged to be important, to reply to the remarks of his colleague on the danger of a destruction of the Constitution, if this bill passed; nor could he believe there existed any analogy between our situation and that of countries in a revolutionary state. Nor could he see the connexion between this subject and a repeal of the internal taxes, diminution of the army, or the abolition of the Mint. He should, therefore, take the liberty of placing all these considerations aside, as having no real relation to the subject.

My colleague has commenced his remarks with deploring that the Legislature of North Carolina should give instructions on a subject on which they cannot possess so much necessary information as is required for a correct decision. In this regret he could not agree with his colleague. He believed they had all the information requisite for a correct judgment. If this subject is so all-important, if it involves a great constitutional question, how can we presume the Legislature of a State which must be deeply interested in it, to be ignorant of its merits? How will the doctrine of the gentleman, which attaches so much importance to the petitions on your table, apply? Will he pretend to say the Legislature of that State is less informed than citizens who occupy but a small section of the country?

In considering this question, his colleague had gone on the ground of constitutionality. In his arguments he has formed a chain of reasoning merely on the abuse of power. He would agree with him that it was impossible to devise any system of Government from which effects may not follow that shall be pernicious. But is this any good reason against giving effect to a reasonable construction? Is it fair to say, because the Legislature have the power of abolishing the office of a judge, that therefore they will turn every judge out of office? This was to suppose that we were lost as to the principle of Government, and ripe for a revolution.

That there must be some place where the true meaning of the Constitution must be determined, all would agree. Where then is it? In what department? The people have constituted two departments of authority, the Executive and Legislative, emanating directly from the people; and have directed them to form another, further removed from the people. Are we then to be told there is more safety in confiding this important power to the last department, so far removed from the people, than in departments flowing directly from the people, responsible to and returning at short intervals into the mass of the people?

Agreeably to our Constitution a judge may be impeached. But if the doctrine contended for on the opposite side prevails, how is this salutary part of the Constitution to operate? Suppose a law to pass, prescribing any duties to a judge; he is to decide whether it is constitutional or not; if he has this right, however he may err, he commits no crime; how, then, can he be impeached?

But my colleague says this is turning the judges out of their offices. But I do not see it in this point of view. I believe the natural consequence of our construction is, that the judge shall hold the office while it exists, and so long as he behaves well, independent of any Legislative or Executive control.

But the appointment of a judge is said to form a contract. Between it and a contract I can see no analogy. There must be two parties to a contract. I will ask, whether a judge is to be considered as a party at the time when the law passed, before there are any courts established, and which are only contemplated to be established?

Again: for whose interest were these offices created? Not for the interest of the individual officers, but the people. If, then, the passage of the law sprang from a regard to the interest and convenience of the people, ought not its continuance to depend upon the same interest and convenience?

To make the judge independent in the tenure of his office, while it remains, and to protect his salary from diminution is sufficient; and it is making him as independent as judges ever have been in the country to which gentlemen are so apt to refer for whatever is worthy of imitation. In England, the Judiciary is said to form the strongest pillar of the Government, and the greatest security of the people; and yet are they independent of the Legislature? Are they not easily removable on the address of the two Houses, while here they can only be removed on the conviction of a crime?

If this doctrine is to extend to the length gentlemen contend, then is the sovereignty of the Government to be swallowed up in the vortex of the Judiciary. Whatever the other departments of the Government may do, they can undo. You may pass a law, but they can annul it. Will not the people be astonished to hear that their laws depend upon the will of the judges, who are themselves independent of all law?

My colleague has made use of an expression made before, but which I hoped would not have been repeated in this House. He says the judges were intended to guard the people from their worst of enemies—from themselves. Are the people to be told that they are so lost to a sense of their own interests, so ignorant and regardless of them, that they must take fifteen or twenty men to guard them from themselves? Is it possible that any man can attempt to make the people believe they are themselves their greatest enemies?

I will agree that there are times when checks and balances are useful. Legislative bodies may occasionally, in a gust of passion, pass improper laws; but because in a solitary instance we may pass such laws, shall we pass all authority into the hands of a few men, who, gentlemen say, know none of these passions, who are calm, cool, and wise men, who know no interests of their own, but are totally absorbed in that of the people? Suppose in our construction we should err, the evil can last no longer than two, at most six years, which are the durations of our office. The people will then dismiss us. But how can the judge be checked, or the evil he commits be remedied?

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

In no way but by a recurrence to revolutionary principles.

But my colleague has read the Constitution of North Carolina, which says that the judges shall be chosen by the joint ballot of the two Houses, and shall hold their offices during good behaviour. And he says this limitation cannot extend to the Executive, because the Executive has no agency in the appointment. It must, therefore, he contends, prohibit the Legislature from repealing the laws which create the office of judge. But was it not possible for the gentleman to conceive that the Legislature might, were it not for the Constitution, have said a judge shall be removed, and passed a law to that effect? Without this Constitutional provision, what would prohibit the Legislature from sweeping off all their judges, and voting in new ones?

After making these remarks on the constitutionality of the measure, I will ask what preference this law, which it is now proposed to repeal, has over the previous system? Does it pay more regard to the convenience of the people? I believe that under it only four States are divided; in all the others, the districts remain as before; and suitors, witnesses, and jurors, have to attend at the same place, under all the inconveniences they before experienced; with this difference, that the jurisdiction of the federal courts is brought down to four hundred instead of five hundred dollars.

If I believed, with my colleague, that a repeal of this law would give a death-blow to the Constitution, I would be the last man to vote for it. But believing, as I do, on the contrary, that the doctrine now contended for would destroy the vital principle of the Constitution, by submitting the entire sovereignty of the nation to judiciary control, and that the only way of resisting this doctrine is to repeal the law, I vote most cheerfully for its repeal.

Mr. HEMPHILL said he would claim the attention of the Committee a short time upon the important question now before them; that his task would principally be to arrange arguments which he had already heard or seen.

He would say but very little as to the expediency of passing the bill on the table; he would not go into a minute comparison of the two judicial systems; but should content himself with submitting a few general observations. The alleged inutility of the law passed the 13th of February, 1801, rested principally upon document No. 8, which accompanied the President's Message. That document contains a list of all suits at common law, suits in chancery, criminal prosecutions, and admiralty causes, which have been commenced in any of the federal courts in the United States, from May, 1790, to April, 1801. It appears that within the time included, eight thousand two hundred and seventy-six causes have been instituted, and of that number one thousand five hundred and thirty-seven are now depending; in the enumeration the State of Maryland is omitted, and probably, with the addition of causes in that State, the aggregate number would be nine thousand, and the causes now depending about one thousand six hundred. With a list of one thousand, six hundred causes undecided, and an annual increase of seven or eight hundred, is it possible, with no other assistance than would be received from the district judges, that six men could perform all this multiplicity of business in its original and final stages, to be transacted at so many different and distinct places, in a country extending one thousand six hundred miles; and that the causes could be decided with that dispatch which the public good requires? What every one would suppose to be the natural consequence of such a system, has been witnessed by the gentlemen of the bar in the eastern part of Pennsylvania; who have deliberately and anxiously declared to you, that in their opinion a renewal of the late system would be attended with great public inconvenience, and without advert- ing to the casualties of weather or indisposition, as inevitable consequences, were embarrassment, uncertainty, and delay.

Sixteen judges were appointed at an expense of thirty-two thousand dollars, three thousand dollars of which will be saved on the first vacancy in the Supreme Court; and when we are about calculating the expense, we should deduct the savings which the new system will certainly make. It must be acknowledged that many of the parties and witnesses will not have so far to attend court. It must be acknowledged that the causes would be sooner decided than under the old system; the unfinished business will rather increase than diminish. Omitting the admiralty causes, there will be about one thousand five hundred undecided causes remaining, and of course three thousand suitors, and if only one witness to a cause, there will be four thousand five hundred people in motion, attending courts. From the two causes which I have mentioned, there will necessarily be a considerable saving; some estimate might be made, and this saving will in some measure be equalized, as no person knows how soon he will be a party or a witness. It is for the trifling difference between this saving and the salaries of a few judges, that the liberty of the people is to be endangered; and, if I am not mistaken, a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES,) when the apportionment bill was before the House, declared that the expense of the Civil List was a trifling thing, a mere speck on the pages of expenditure, and that it was the expense of maintaining armies and fleets that we should guard against.

The expense of the augmented representation in this House will be nearly, if not quite, equal to the salaries of the judges. I think I may with great safety appeal to the people, and ask them which expense will be most to their advantage? Before I enter into the discussion of the main question, I beg leave, Mr. Chairman, to make a few preliminary remarks. The first is, as to the salaries of the judges of the district courts of Kentucky and Tennessee, which were increased by law, which must be acknowledged to be so far Constitutional. Can you repeal the law generally, and thereby diminish the compensation of the judges? I do not mean to contend that the office of a judge is to outlive the Constitution. Every officer is removable by a change in that part of the Constitution on which his office depends; if, by any event, the Constitution should be entirely dissolved, the officers will revert to the common class, and the people must again begin to build up a new government. It has been said that our Constitution exhibits the absurdity of an office without an officer; quasi a judge, entitled to his salary, without any duty to perform, and the strange phenomenon of an officer not amenable to your laws, to your Constitution, or to the people. These observations amount to nothing; they are taking that as data which is the only thing to be proven; for the sole question is, can an office be taken away from a judge? I think no person will seriously contend that the framers of the Constitution ever intended that a man should be entitled to his salary, when he is not in the possession of his office; indeed, the words in the Constitution do not embrace the extent of the proposition; the words are, "during his continuance in office."

In regard to the main question, Mr. Chairman, I will in the first place read the ninth and tenth amendments to the Constitution:

"9. The enumeration, in the Constitution of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others, retained by the people.

"10. The powers not delegated to the United States, by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

The question is between the United States and their rulers. In behalf of the people it is contended, that the power you are about to exercise does not belong to you, but that it was reserved to the people at the formation of the Constitution; the rulers say no, the power belongs to us, and we can and will exercise it, whenever we deem it expedient. I submit to the consideration of this honorable Committee, if in such a case there should be a reasonable doubt, whether it will not be most delicate and safe to let that doubt operate in favor of the people. We are not here, sir, clothed with the full power of the American people; we are here in a circumscribed sphere, exercising a limited power. The people are the original fountain of all power; we only possess a part of their power. Bearing constantly this view of the subject in our minds, many questions put may be readily answered. As when it is asked, is the creature greater than its God? Cannot he who makes destroy? Has not one Legislature as much power as another? As to the two first, the idea is correct, when applied to the original power; it is correct or incorrect when applied to a limited power, according to the words and meaning of the instrument giving that power; the instrument giving power to Congress, has inhibited the power which has a right to create, from destroying, as in the case of the salary of the President, and the compensation of the judges; the President and Senate also have the power to appoint judges, but not to remove them, and the question is, does not the instrument giving power to Congress restrain them from taking away the office of a judge, as in the above instance, giving a power to create and not to destroy? As to the question, has not one Legislature as much power as another? I answer yes; both deriving their power from the same instrument must be precisely the same; but this proves nothing till it is shown that any Legislature can take away the office of a judge. Many other ideas advanced on this subject are predicated upon the supposed abuse of power, and strike at the very existence of written constitutions, and tend to show the impracticability of being governed under them. Suppose one Legislature was to create a million of judges, who is to correct the evil? Is it possible, it is asked, that another Legislature should not have power instantly to correct the shameful abuse of the people's right? Suppose, on the other hand, that a Legislature, previous to the President's election, should raise his salary to a million a year, will it be contended that the next Legislature, agreeably to the Constitution, could decrease the salary? It will not; and why not have the power in one case as well as in the other? There are many cases under our Constitution, where the people run the risk of the abuse of power, and have retained the power of correction in their own hands: and what is the plain remedy for an evil in the present case, if it should exist? If the number of your judges is a little too great, declare that vacancies shall not be filled; if they become corrupted, impeach them; if, by any uncommon event in the circumstances of the country, or the wickedness of the Legislature, the number should be extravagantly great and useless, put them down by changing that part of the Constitution. And this, sir, is not a monstrously difficult thing. We have already had amendments to the Constitution, when the emergency was not so great. If an evil should grow out of any part of the Constitution, it can easily be removed by the hands of the people constitutionally raised; the judges are secure and not within the reach of a raging party, yet they must always remain within the reach of the cool reflection of the nation; and if the people will not agree to make this change, it will be a proof that the evil does not exist, and the great order of things ought not to be changed for mere imaginary complaints.

If Congress, in coming here, and carrying with them the sentiments of the people, and as their immediate representatives, can do everything which may appear to them for the good of the people, under every change of circumstances, a written Constitution would be useless. Upon this principle the Senate is unnecessary. The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. HENDERSON) has properly dilated upon this view of the subject. Our Constitution is founded on different principles, and such ideas ought not to govern in putting a construction on it. The people have retained power to themselves, and have said to the Legislature, thus far shall you go and no farther. There are certain cases wherein you shall not be the judges of what will or will not be for our advantage. We have fixed the principle, and have taken the responsibility upon ourselves—on this reserved ground you are not to walk. One of the great and leading principles agreed upon by the people, we contend, was the independence of the judges. They calculated that the great good flowing from this principle would far outweigh any apprehension of the abuse of this power in giving birth to too many or improper judges. If, Mr. Chairman, I have perfectly comprehended the arguments of our opponents, they all converge to one or other of two points: 1st. That the words in the Constitution refer exclusively to the Executive, and are meant to render the judges independent of him only; the second point, which is rather a subordinate one, operating in support of the first, is that the office of judge is created by law, and not by the Constitution; that it is a creature of the law, whose life and death is to proceed from the same hand. I will proceed to examine these two points, giving my hearty assent to the acknowledgment of our opponents, that it is dangerous to the liberties of the people to legislate upon constructive power.

As to the first point, I would ask on what part of the Constitution is this opinion founded? where is it so expressed? If there had been an express provision that the Executive might remove officers at pleasure, there would be some weight in the argument, though far from being conclusive, that this clause was intended to prevent him from exercising a power in regard to the judges, which he was allowed to exercise as to all other officers. When nothing of this appears on the face of the Constitution, how can you infer it, for the purpose of making one implication assist you in making another? You make words, which are general, apply to a part; by implication, you say that the power that has a right to create has a right to destroy, if not prohibited. By this rule the Executive can remove all officers of his own appointment. By the same rule of implication, Congress can abolish all officers of their own creating, if there is no restriction. In this way the Executive and Congress have each of them the office in their power; the Executive can remove the man, Congress can remove the office, then comes in a general clause of the restriction, including both the man and the office, and to whom is it to refer? If words are the signs of ideas, to both most inevitably; and, besides, as a proof that it does not refer exclusively to the Executive, he is not named in the section; yet Congress are named, and acts to be done by Congress run all through it. In the first section of the third article, it is declared that "a judge shall hold his office during good behaviour." The office is an object of Legislative creation, and the thing thus to be created by the Legislature the judge is to hold for a certain time. If the object is to prevent the Executive from taking away the officer, leaving the office, a correct expression of that intention would have been, that the judges shall not be removed from office; and these words are used in the affirmative, when the officer and the office are to be separated, and the office left. [Here Mr. HENRILL read from the Constitution third section first article, No. 7, 1st section second article, No. 6, and fourth section second article.] But when the office and the officer are inseparable for a certain time, different words are used. The President shall hold his office during the term of four years; the judge shall hold his office during good behaviour. The tenure of office in each case is included in the same words.

As to the other point, that it is an office created by law, and not by the Constitution, and therefore may be removed by a law, let this principle be tested by the Constitution itself, and not from anything out of it. I aver, that in every instance where the Constitution has spoken of the continuance of any one thing, although the creation of the particular object is optional with Congress, yet the moment they give it existence it is out of their power, and must continue during the time mentioned in the Constitution. Apply this principle first to the salary of the Executive and judges. The salaries are created by law, and when created, their continuance is fixed by the Constitution. Apply the principle to the members of this House. When the bill fixing the ratio of representation was before us, could we have fixed a ratio decreasing the present number of representatives, and have made the law take effect immediately, and thereby disqualified members now on the floor from taking their seats next session, when they had been elected for two years? Yet their right to seats here was created by a law which was discretionary as to the number. Apply the principle to the Senators. New States may be admitted by Congress into the Union; yet when the new States shall have been admitted, and two Senators chosen in consequence of the law, can Congress repeal the law, dismember the Union in part, and turn out the Senators? The right of citizenship also is acquired by a law; yet when strangers have become members of our nation, in virtue of a law, can Congress repeal that law, and thereby disfranchise a part of her citizens? Yet in both of these cases it might be said that they were the throes of a dying Administration to provide for its friends. The law also fixing the permanent seat of Government, agreeably to the Constitution, seems to afford an analogous case, and I question if it could be repealed, unless words mean anything, and then Congress can do anything.

To come to a right understanding of the Constitution, it will be necessary to inquire what was the generally received opinion about the time the Constitution was adopted. I have ever understood that there was no difference of opinion on this point; that the general opinion was, that the words in the Constitution rendered the judges independent of both the other branches of the Government. This appears from the debates in the Convention in Virginia to have been their opinion; it appears, also, from the strongest implication, to have been the opinion of the author of the Notes on Virginia. If we can receive no aid from any of these sources, we must take up the Constitution, and apply to it the general rules for the interpretation of solemn instruments of writing. If in this instrument we find one express and positive provision, it must have its full force, unless we find another provision equally positive, and so inconsistent, that one or the other must give way. In the Constitution we find these words: "The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour," without any other condition or qualification; take these words detached from any other part of the Constitution, and I ask, do they not contain an express and positive provision? If so, what part of the Constitution is so inconsistent as to change the nature of this provision from a positive into a conditional one, and, in substance, to add these words, viz: "on this condition, that Congress permit the office so long to remain." It is said, in the eighth section of the first article, that "Congress shall have power to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court." This power was necessary to be given, otherwise the tribunals could not have been constituted, and when constituted, the duration of the office is limited in another part of the Constitution; and any implied power therein contained cannot be inconsistent with an express provision; for a mere implication is never to take preference to a positive provision. The other words relied upon are contained in the first section of the third article. What is the meaning of the words, from time to time? They are used but in three parts of the Constitution, and when used they do not convey the idea of undoing what may be done. Indeed, they are used in cases where it is impracticable to undo what shall have been done. [Mr. H. here read the fifth section, first article, No. 3; ninth section, first article, No. 6; and the third section, second article.] What do these words mean in that part of the Constitution under this discussion? The Supreme Court had been mentioned in the second and third article; the Supreme Court, which implies that there should be but one. They were not used to give Congress power to constitute inferior courts, for that power had been previously given, and if the inferior courts, together with the offices of the judges, are, as is contended, subjects of ordinary legislation, those words were unnecessary to enlarge the power of Congress on them, for on all subjects of ordinary legislation, Congress have an unquestionable right to enact and repeal at pleasure. It is not said in the eighth section, first article, that Congress shall have power to borrow money from time to time, to regulate commerce from time to time, or to establish post offices and post roads from time to time; yet nobody doubts that Congress have a right to make and repeal laws on these subjects, when it may appear expedient; and the same power would have extended to the clause giving power to constitute inferior tribunals, if there had been no restriction in any other part of the Constitution. As these words are unnecessary to give the power contended for, they must have some other meaning. The plain meaning is this: that these words, together with the first part of the section, were not used to give a power to constitute courts, for that power had been previously given; they were merely introduced to dispose of the Judiciary power, and to declare where it should reside. "The Judiciary power of the United States shall be vested in the Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish;" meaning the power before given, which was discretionary as to number; the clause in the eighth section of the first article is brought here into view, and in the very next sentence the offices are positively fixed and limited. Here, then, is an express and positive provision, uncontradicted by any express declaration, or by any violent implication. It is said, that there are words of negation used as to the compensation of the judges, and why not to the offices? If the words had been: and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation during their continuance in office—will any man in his senses say that the compensation could be taken away during that continuance? Yet, although the compensation could not be taken away, it might be lessened, and the words of negation were to prevent that diminution; but as the legal signification of an office could not be lessened, the words there would have been surplusage.

But, Mr. Chairman, is it probable that the framers of the Constitution ever intended to invest Congress with a power to destroy the office of a judge, in a rising country like this, where all the various sources of litigation are daily increasing? They foresaw that new judges would be wanted from time to time, but they never could have pictured to themselves a necessity of dispensing with the old judges. If we were framing a Constitution this moment, if we had any regard for the independence of the judges, would we invest Congress with a power to remove them, or take away the offices? We could calculate with reasonable certainty, that if there should at any time be a necessity for their appointment, there would always in this country be a necessity for their continuance; and we could trust this power to one Legislature as confidently as to another. If the framers of the Constitution could have entertained any suspicion that a Legislature, in 1801, would have created useless judges for party purposes, with equal propriety they might have supposed that a Legislature, in 1802, would destroy useful judges for party purposes. But the independence of the Judicial department was the object. This was the invaluable principle, and not more liable to abuse than the other principles fixed by the Constitution, and there was no principle so necessary to be settled as the independence of the judges. If we are to argue from the abuse of power, what is there to prevent Congress from admitting into the Union more new States than would be for the advantage of the nation? The late Administration, with the consent of the Legislature of Massachusetts, might have erected the province of Maine into fifteen or twenty States. The fact is, if there is a necessity for a new State, at the time of its admission into the Union, the probability is, there will always be a necessity. So, if there is a necessity of a judge at the time of his appointment, the probability is that there will always be a necessity, and the Legislature giving birth to one or the other, are the Constitutional judges of that necessity, and no other Legislature has a right to interfere. My opinion is, that the framers of the Constitution intended that the judges should be independent of both the other branches of Government; that they have spoken plainly and unequivocally; and that the moment that the judge is appointed, the office is ingrafted in, and becomes a part of the Constitution, and cannot be taken away without impairing the Constitution itself.

With regard, Mr. Chairman, to the distinction that is taken between the supreme and inferior courts, for my own part I cannot see any force in the argument. Any person of common candor must acknowledge, when he reads the first section and second section of the third articles that there is as imperative an injunction to establish some inferior courts, as there is to establish one supreme court. It is said that the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, and of course there must be inferior courts, from which the appeals are to be made, and the duration of office in both courts is contained in the same sentence and words; and it is absurd to suppose that the framers of the Constitution affixed a double meaning to these words. The reasons urged against our construction, apply as well to the Supreme Court as to the inferior courts. A dying Administration could provide for its friends by increasing the number of judges in the Supreme Court, with as much facility as by creating inferior tribunals. But, sir, if Congress have the power contended for, there is not a judge on the supreme bench who is not completely in their power. The Constitution does not say how many judges there shall be, so that you may remove all but one, or you may pass a law placing six new judges on the bench, by the side of the present judges, and then, for the good of the people, conclude that twelve judges are unnecessary, and repeal the law which created the first six judges, and the imperative words in the Constitution will be complied with; the Supreme Court being always in existence. I see nothing in the Constitution which prohibits Congress from changing the name of an inferior court, if by the same act the office with all that appertains to it is some where preserved. And that Congress have a right to transfer some of the duties of the judges from one tribunal to another, is clear and evident; it is incident to the power of constituting new tribunals; for when a new court is created, some of the business which would have been cognizable in the old court, must be transferred to the new tribunal. It was this kind of power that Congress exercised in passing the law last session; but they did not touch the office, which consists in certain powers, jurisdiction, and authority, conferred on a particular person, requiring of him certain duties which may be exercised in a court bearing a different name from that of the judge. Under the old system the district judges sat in the circuit courts, the supreme judges sat in the circuit courts; and under the old system the district judges of Kentucky and Tennessee had the powers cognizable in a circuit court, with some exceptions as to appeals and writs of error; and the twenty-fourth section of the law of February 13, 1801, which abolishes the two district courts; transferred the Constitutional parts of the offices, to wit: all the power, authority, and jurisdiction of the said courts into the circuit courts; and by the seventh section of the same law, the district judges of Tennessee and Kentucky, with a circuit judge, are to hold the circuit courts; and in the same section it is expressly declared, that when the offices of the district judges, in the districts of Kentucky and Tennessee respectively, shall become vacant, such vacancies shall be supplied by the appointment of two additional circuit judges, which appointments, of course, must be made in the usual way. And in the third section of the same law, Congress have virtually acknowledged their want of power to take away the office of a judge, and have provided, that after the next vacancy in the Supreme Court, it shall consist of five justices only. And as to the additional salaries of the district judges, they will be presumed to be equal to the additional duties, until a complaint is made, and then the fact must be ascertained.

This law, then, Mr. Chairman, which expressly recognises the judge, which expressly continues his duties, and which expressly continues his salary, is likened to a law which destroys the office of a judge, takes away his duty, takes away his salary, and leaves his commission a blank piece of paper; and this is the rock on which gentlemen stand, when they triumphantly ask, were we the guardians of the Constitution when the first law passed?

Mr. Chairman, ingenuity has been exhausted in contriving cases wherein it is said our construction will not hold good. It is asked if, in the case of a war, a whole State should be ceded, if the offices of judges would remain? Certainly not; but here the provision of the Constitution would not be complied with, the whole strength of the nation would not be sufficient to protect it; yet it would be a case of necessity, calamity, or war, which no Constitution can provide against; and, in the case put, the most important part of the Constitution would not be complied with, which guaranties to each State in the Union a Republican form of Government; yet in that event the people of the ceded State might become the slaves of a tyrant.

But, Mr. Chairman, a doctrine new and dangerous has begun to unfold itself. It is said that the Judiciary is a subordinate and not a co-ordinate branch of the Government, that the judges have no right to declare a law to be unconstitutional; that no such power is given to that branch in the Constitution. Why, sir, it is nowhere declared that Congress have a right to exercise their judgment, or to consider the expediency of a measure; the Judiciary, from the nature of their institution, are to judge of the law and what is the law. The Constitution is paramount and supreme. The judge is bound by oath to support it. The Legislature have a right to exercise their judgment as to the constitutionality of a law on its passage; but the Judiciary decide at last, and their decision is final. This doctrine is admitted in the debates of the Convention of Virginia—in the case of Vanhorne, lessee, vs. Dorrance. Judge Patterson has expressed the same opinion, when he could have had no view to this question:

"I hold it to be a position equally clear and sound, that in such a case, it will be the duty of the court to adhere to the Constitution and to declare the act null and void. It is an important principle, which, in the discussion of questions of this kind, ought never to be lost sight of, that the Judiciary in this country is not a subordinate, but co-ordinate branch of the Government."

The Chief Magistrate of Pennsylvania has recently expressed the same sentiment, and the correctness of his legal opinions will not be called in question by any party; in assigning his reasons for not approving a law, he says:

"And I cannot, from a confidence in the legal knowledge, integrity, and fortitude of my former brethren in the Supreme Court, risk my character in a Judicial decision on this question, when I do not foresee any advantage to be derived to my country, from a possibility of success."

But, sir, if it is once established that the Judiciary is a subordinate and dependent branch of the Government, I acknowledge that they have no right to judge of the constitutionality of a law, or, if they have the power, they will be afraid to exercise it. Upon this principle, where will an influential partisan and an insignificant individual meet to adjust their claims? In this House, or in a tribunal under the influence of this House? Where will the powerful State of Virginia and the State of Delaware meet upon terms of equality; in this House, or in a tribunal under the immediate control of this House? Where could the Federal administration of justice in this country be deposited with more safety than where it is? Intrenched as our judges are, they can do but little harm, but much good; from their situation they can have no temptation to make inroads upon the rights of the people; there is no such thing as Judicial patronage; they can appoint no officers, collect no moneys, raise no armies, raise no fleets. They have nothing but their virtue and talents to recommend them to the people. If it is within the power of human contrivance to select a spot where the streams of justice will flow pure and uncontaminated, it is in a tribunal of independent judges.

The three grand branches of our Government are well arranged. The President has his proportionate weight in the Judiciary, by appointing the judges; when they are appointed they are independent, and in this situation are to guard the Legislature from making encroachments on the liberties of the people. The Legislature, in turn, have a check on them by bringing them to trial and punishment, if they should become corrupted; this trial is to commence in this House, which will always be a repository of a sufficiency of passion and spirit to commence the impeachment, if there is a reasonable cause; the trial is to be ended in the Senate, where the members, from their permanency, will be likely to be cool, and not convict unless they are guilty. Thus the parts are interwoven, operating as checks and controls on each other; but once cut the ligament, and perhaps the dreadful consequences have not been too highly colored. The effect may not be immediate, but let the principle be practised upon by two or three changes of administration, and it will become as much a matter of course to remove the judges as the heads of departments, and in bad times the judges would be no better than a sword in the hands of a party, to put out of the way great and obnoxious characters for pretended treasons.

The independence of the judges was a great point gained by the people of England. While the tenure of office depended on the nod of the Crown, they supported the arbitrary measures of the King; in one instance they decided that the King had a right to levy ship-money, without the consent of Parliament or people; and many an instance might be brought to the recollection of this honorable Committee, where they determined through fear, and not from judgment. It is said they are not independent of Parliament. Why, sir, nothing is independent of Parliament; and there is not the same necessity there. There being no written constitution in England, the Judiciary forms no check upon Parliament; and, besides, our Government is not a copy of the British Government; and this is not the only solitary instance where we have outstripped, as it is called, our too favorite prototype. There is not a leading feature in the Constitution that bears testimony of any servile imitation; it is our opponents who wish to test our Constitution by the principles of the British Government; it is they who wish that a construction be put upon the Constitution by Congress, which shall be considered as the Constitution itself; and are unwilling that there should be any check to oppose it; and of course, every construction put on it by the different Legislatures, will exhibit the appearance of a new Constitution, a constitution to be tossed and blown about by every political breeze. The powers of Congress will be equal to the powers of the English Parliament, transcendant, splendid, and without control. I little expected that such lordly power would be grasped at by our plain Republicans, who have no ambitious desires, and who wish rulers to be contented with humble prerogatives.

Mr. Chairman, when I reflect upon the intrinsic nature of the question, I am confounded and amazed; it is vast indeed—from a dread of its terrible consequences. Yet, in its nature, it consists in the open denial of the obvious meaning of a few words in the Constitution; we repeat these words, gentlemen deny their plain sense. We read "That the judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour." Our opponents say that these words do not mean "that the judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour." The meaning of these words is entirely different; it is, in fact, the reverse; they do not infringe our power; they refer to the Executive; although the office to be holden is not of Executive creation, and he can neither make it nor destroy it: the thing to be holden during good behaviour, is an object of Legislative creation. Certainly our opponents cannot drive us out of the firm ground on which we stand, and tell us that these words are not in the Constitution. They are, and how are they to be got rid of? No other way, under Heaven, Mr. Chairman, than by a bold and arbitrary assertion that they do not bear their natural meaning; that they do not bear the same meaning which they bear in another part of the Constitution. The people have said that a judge shall hold his office until a certain event shall happen; the rulers say no, we will shorten the period, and this is not breaking the Constitution; or, in other words, the people have said that a judge shall hold his office during good behaviour; the rulers say, the meaning of that is, that the office can be taken away at any moment. Why, sir, what part of the Constitution will hold gentlemen? what words are in it that are strong enough, and what meaning cannot be as easily distorted and perverted? We have a right to our seats here for two years, if we do not behave disorderly; yet it might as well be said that the meaning of that is, that two-thirds can expel the other third at any moment, notwithstanding their good behaviour. Our opponents complain of the want of power; that their power would be too much cramped and restrained from its natural freedom by our construction. Why, sir, that is the object of a written Constitution, to place objects out of the reach of legislative power. It is its great and grand design.

I ask pardon of the Committee for detaining them so long. I ascribe no wicked motives to our opponents. I have the charity to believe that their motives are good and virtuous; yet I am confident, that through a mistaken zeal for the good of the people, they are going too far, and are destroying the Constitution of our country.

The further consideration of the said bill was postponed till to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, February 17.

A representation of sundry counsellors at law, practising in the Courts of the State of New Jersey, and in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey, was presented to the House and read, praying that the act of Congress, passed on the thirteenth of February, one thousand eight hundred and one, entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the Courts of the United States," may not be repealed, for the reasons specified in the said representation.—Referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the fourth instant, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes."

Ordered, That Mr. DENNIS be added to the committee appointed, on the ninth instant, to prepare and bring in a bill or bills "for opening a navigable canal to connect the waters of Potomac river with those of the Eastern Branch thereof, through Tiber Creek, and the low lands at the foot of the Capitol Hill," in the room of Mr. SPRIGG, who resigned his seat in the House on the eleventh instant.

On motion, it was Ordered, That Mr. BRENT be excused from serving on the committee appointed, on the eighth of December last, "to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations or amendments may be necessary in the existing government and laws of the District of Columbia, and to report by bill, or otherwise;" and that Mr. CAMPBELL be appointed of the said committee in his stead.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting the report of the Director of the Mint. The said Message, and the report referred to therein, were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Another Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a statement of the expenses incurred by the United States in their transactions with the Barbary Powers, and a roll of the persons having office or employment under the United States. The Message was read, and, together with the documents accompanying the same, ordered to lie on the table.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. THOMPSON.—I find the opinions I entertain, so extremely adverse to the sentiments yesterday expressed on this subject by the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. HENDERSON,) who opened this debate, and the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HEMPHILL,) whose great ingenuity I feel pleasure in acknowledging, that I feel myself impelled to offer to the consideration of the Committee a few observations in reply to the arguments used by those gentlemen. But, Mr. Chairman, while I pay the tribute of my respect to the eloquence and ability which the gentleman from North Carolina has displayed in the discussion of this subject, I must pray that honorable gentleman to pardon me when I declare myself unable to follow him, when, soaring on fancy's airy pinion, he transported us across the Atlantic, and presented to our view, in the most vivid colors which language can portray, the spirit of innovation, sweeping morality and good order from the earth. Nor will I pretend, sir, that my humble genius will enable me to pursue him, when he forced this same spirit of innovation to mount the whirlwind and lash on the storm. But, sir, with such talents as I am endowed with, I have no objection to going into the consideration of the question before the Committee, and pursuing the order which the gentleman has had the goodness to suggest, as the most natural into which the subject can be divided—that is, 1st. The power of the Legislature to pass, and 2dly, The expediency, under the existing state of things, of passing the bill now upon your table.

Under these two heads, I will endeavor to meet, as far as I shall be able to recollect them, the most impressive arguments which have been used by the gentlemen; and I will beg leave in the first place to call the attention of the Committee to the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, which has been very slightly touched on by the gentleman from North Carolina, and which has been attended to, with much ingenuity, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. By this section the Legislative powers of Congress are defined. "Congress shall have power," says the Constitution, "to levy taxes, to borrow money, to coin money," and, among a variety of other powers, "to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court." It is an axiom in politics that an ordaining power always embraces a repealing power; if Congress have a right to constitute courts, they have the right to modify and to annul the courts so constituted; this, like various others, is merely a discretionary power, to be exercised, or not exercised, as Congress shall find conducive to the public welfare; the granting a power does not oblige the exercise of that power; neither does the exercise of power make the laws resulting from that Constitutional exercise of power unchangeable and irrepealable. The same Constitution, giving this power, gives various other powers, as I have already shown; yet it has never been contended that the laws passed under these conceded powers are irrepealable. Still, by a parity of reason, and with a reference to this particular section of the Constitution, if the laws relating to the Judiciary establishment of the United States are irrepealable, so must the various laws passed under these granted powers, relating to your revenue, to your army, to your navy, to your mint, be irrepealable. But every gentleman knows that laws resulting from these powers have been passed, have been modified, and have been repealed; and so likewise has the law establishing the Judiciary system. Without carrying you through the tedious detail of the twenty-six or twenty-seven laws which have been passed upon this subject, it will be quite sufficient for my purpose to notice the law of the last session of Congress, the 27th section of which begins with these words:

"And be it further enacted, That the circuit court of the United States heretofore established shall cease and be abolished."

We travel not then in a wilderness, Mr. Chairman, untrodden by human footsteps; our immediate predecessors, it appears to me, are the pioneers who point out to us the path we should pursue for the benefit of our constituents. They have not only abolished the circuit courts, but reorganized the whole system; they have constituted new courts and new judges, and they have lessened the duties of the judges of the supreme courts. To say that a subsequent Legislature have not a right to repeal a law of a precedent Legislature is to proclaim such precedent Legislature infallible—that they are more just, more wise, more competent to the exercise of their functions, than any Legislature which shall follow them. It is a contradiction of the progress of knowledge, and of the improvements which may result from experience; it is a denial of the utility of frequent elections; because that Legislature which had attained the acme of perfection ought to be permanent and unchangeable. The law, however, of the last session, which I have just now cited, having modified the courts of the United States, concedes the power of modification to be in the Legislature. But, sir, even this concession, such as it is, is now, by the arguments of gentlemen, so clogged with appendages, so qualified by expositions, that whilst with one breath the power of modification is admitted, with the very next that power is unnerved, is rendered useless; for, says the gentleman from North Carolina, a department of the Government has been erected, called the Judiciary, not holding their office during pleasure, but during good behaviour, and whatever power attempts to deprive them of their offices violates the Constitution. It is admitted, then, that Congress have power to modify the law; but it is denied that they have power to abolish the offices of the judges.

Let us then inquire, Mr. Chairman, by what tenure the judges hold their offices: "The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour."—Constitution, article 3, section 1. The gentleman from North Carolina inquires, If they have been guilty of any misdemeanor? How, then, are we to break down this Constitutional rampart with which they are entrenched? How, to use the gentleman's own expression, are the judges to be hurled from their offices? There is no gentleman, Mr. Chairman, within these walls, who would more sincerely wish the Judiciary to possess a due and proper independence than myself; but although I do not admit the right of the Legislature to hurl these judges from their offices, yet I must contend and shall ever contend for the right which Congress possesses to abolish an office; or, in other words, to repeal a law creating an office, whenever it shall be plainly proved to them that such an office is unnecessary and oppressive. They may hold their offices during good behaviour, if their offices exist; but most certainly the moment the office is legally destroyed—that is, the moment the law establishing the office is repealed, there must be an end of the tenure. Those sages who formed the Constitution, Mr. Chairman, never contemplated a privileged order of men in that society for whose happiness they formed that instrument. The exposition, which is now given to it, is very different indeed from that which was intended by them. I have read, and have heard, sir, that this is a Government of experiment. That in the annals of nations it has no likeness—no prototype. The effects of this particular department of the Government were not better understood than the effects of the other departments of the Government; it was to be tested by experience, the touchstone of truth; if one system in its operation did not answer the expectation of the Legislature, ample room was allowed for the introduction of some other, and for the abolition of the former; hence come the expressions "from time to time ordain and establish." What says the Constitution? "The Judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and such inferior courts, as Congress shall from time to time ordain and establish." Congress may, then, or Congress may not from time to time ordain and establish courts. But, if they establish courts, so likewise may they abolish courts. Into what a variety of absurdities shall we be plunged, if we reject this reasonable interpretation? The right to modify the law being conceded, but not the right to deprive the judges of their offices, our country would exhibit a spectacle which it never has yet, and I hope never will exhibit—officers without offices—judges without courts—a privileged order—out of the reach of the Constitution, (for being deprived of their offices they cannot be impeached,) drawing money from the Treasury and rendering no services for their salaries. Is this the meaning of that Constitution which declares, that "The judges during their continuance in office shall receive a compensation for their services?" A compensation?

But suppose, Mr. Chairman, they perform no service—suppose there be no service for them to perform, what, then, is to be their compensation? Will the judge say to the Legislature, increase my duties, make them proportionate to my salary, and I will perform them? Not so, Mr. Chairman; an increase of salary is never objected to; a diminution of duty is never objected to; but, if duties are increased, salaries must also be increased. If I understand the word "compensation," it signifies a something given for a something performed. But, if there be no duty performed (and if there be no office there can be no duty) then there ought to be no compensation. In the English language there is such a word as "sinecure." This is a word, Mr. Chairman, which as yet we do not practically understand. This is a word abhorrent to the spirit of our Constitution. Yet, sir, if the construction of the Constitution, which is now contended for, be admitted, this will be a word which we shall soon practically feel, and practically understand. We shall have a set of men receiving the public treasures not in consideration of public services, but without any services whatever being performed; or, in other words, we shall lay the foundation of a sinecure system, the consequences of which will be incalculable, and the effects of which will be indescribably destructive.

But, Mr. Chairman, I will show you a precedent, and a recent one, too, where the Legislature put a different construction upon the Constitution; I will show you a precedent where a Federal Congress, our immediate predecessors, did not hesitate to exercise the powers we contend for. By the 27th section of the law of the last session, which I have had occasion before to advert to, the circuit courts are abolished. Then that Congress not only thought themselves justifiable in touching the judges of the inferior courts, but of the Supreme Court likewise; for you will find that the same law which constituted the Supreme Court, allotted to the judges of that court, particular and express duties or offices—that is, to perform the duties of a judge of the Supreme Court, as is in that law defined, and to perform the duties of judges of the circuit court, as is likewise defined in that law; and in abolishing the circuit courts, half the offices of the judges of the Supreme Court were abolished.

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, that Congress had as great a right to abolish the whole office as half the office; but whether that was an infraction of the Constitution, or whether it would be an infraction of the Constitution to abolish the office of a judge of the Supreme Court, I will not detain you to inquire, because it appears to bear but little upon the immediate subject before us, it not being the intention of the bill, as I understand it, to interfere with the offices of the judges of the Supreme Court, further than to restore them to that firm, that rightful, that Constitutional ground, on which they stood previously to the passage of the law of the last session, and to all the duties and immunities of which I most sincerely wish to see them restored.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has informed us, it is acknowledged that the law of the last session is Constitutional; in this I can by no means agree with that gentleman. There is one section in that law, sir, which in my humble opinion is a flagrant violation of the Constitution. By the 24th section of that law the district courts of Kentucky and Tennessee are abolished. Had our predecessors stopped at this point, we should have no cause on this day to charge them with a violation of their charter, they would have done no more in principle than we now contend we have a right to do. But they went further—they usurped a power in my opinion not given them by the Constitution, they usurped a power exclusively vested in the President and Senate. By the seventh section of the same law, the judges of the district courts of Kentucky and Tennessee are appointed circuit judges in fact, not indeed in name, but in reality the duties of circuit judges of the sixth circuit are assigned them. The district courts of Kentucky and Tennessee are abolished, and I wish to be informed if they are not circuit judges to all intents and purposes, and I wish further to be informed, if they are not circuit judges appointed by the Legislature, and in direct violation of that article of the Constitution, which has, in the most express terms, vested this power in the President and Senate? Sir, did I apprehend the gentleman from Pennsylvania aright, when I understood him to say, the name of a judge does not define or constitute the duty of a judge?

This is indeed a melancholy exemplification. Shall I be told that by the law they are styled district judges? How long, Mr. Chairman, are we to be imposed on by sound, how long are we to be entangled with the cobwebs of sophistry? But sir, the gentleman from North Carolina has warned us, solemnly warned us, against a violation of the Constitution. Was that gentlemen a member of this House when the law which I have just been speaking of, passed? I perceive by your journals that he was—why then, sir, were not these sensations, which he now experiences with such exquisite sensibility, awakened? Why were they not awakened a year ago, when he might perhaps have prevented an actual violation of the Constitution? I ask the honorable gentleman, sir, when with a sacrilegious hand this vital wound was inflicted on the Constitution, if he raised the plaintive cry of—Spare, oh! spare the Constitution of my country? Yesterday, sir, the gentleman informed us if the bill on your table should pass he would heave no sigh, he would drop no tear over the expiring Constitution. When that law passed, did he heave no sigh, did he drop no tear? Oh, no, sir, very different was the course which was then pursued. With cool, with cruel deliberation, the devoted victim was immolated, and the blood which issued from the gaping wound will forever stain the pages of your statute book.

Mr. Chairman, the expediency of the law now under consideration, and the propriety of adopting a measure of this nature, at the present time, have been so fully and so satisfactorily discussed in the Senate, not many days ago, that to this point I shall apply but few observations. Coming from a State where justice is administered with promptness and frugality, I confess that the stupendous fabric of the Federal Judiciary excites my astonishment. I had, sir, supposed, that the document, which has been furnished by the Executive, would be a full and complete answer to anything that could be said on this division of the subject; but, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has informed us that if the undecided causes of the State of Maryland were added, the aggregate number of depending causes in the courts of the United States would probably amount to sixteen hundred, and he inquires if it is practicable for the courts, after the repeal of the law of the last session, to determine this number of causes scattered over the United States? Sir, when I cast my eyes across the Potomac, and call to recollection the system of jurisprudence established in my country, I cannot hesitate a moment in giving him an affirmative answer.

I have not, Mr. Chairman, nor was it possible for me to procure, documents from the district courts of my State to show to the Committee the number of suits which are depending in them. But, sir, when I reflect how often I have seen a venerable citizen of that State, respectable for his great learning, respectable for his irreproachable life, and respectable for his years, (being aged I believe, full seventy,) who is judge of the high court of chancery there, devoting his days and his nights to the avocations of his office, in the plain garb of a common citizen, dispensing justice and satisfaction to the multitude of citizens whose causes are tried before his tribunal; when I reflect on the number of citizens whose causes are tried before his tribunal; when I reflect on the number of decisions which are made in his court in the course of a year; and when I overlook a document which I have now in my possession from the clerk of that court, and which I shall presently offer to the view of this Committee, I can have no difficulty in pronouncing the sincere opinion which I entertain that he performs more duty, and perhaps with greater ability, than the whole judicial corps of the United States. [Mr. T. here read the document.]

And what, Mr. Chairman, is the compensation which this venerable citizen receives? Fifteen hundred dollars—no more; compare this with the sum which supports and decorates the fair composite column which we are informed is one of the strong pillars of our Government; and to touch which we are told will occasion the beautiful fabric to tumble in the dust. Have we not State courts diffused in abundance over every commonwealth composing this Union? Are they not competent to the decision of all cases of controversy between citizen and citizen? Is not the jurisdiction of the Federal court extremely limited from the true and genuine construction of the Constitution? Where then was the necessity of the law of the last session which ramified and increased these courts? But, sir, the gentleman from North Carolina has found another use for them; he has told us, “the people, when they established this Constitution did not delegate the power of legislation to the House of Representatives alone. They established the Senate as a check upon the House of Representatives; knowing the violent impulses which often actuate popular assemblies, they gave the President, too, the power to negative laws. When a law had passed these various branches of the Government, it became necessary to erect a third department, called the Judiciary, not holding their offices during pleasure, but ‘during good behaviour.’” Did I comprehend the argument of gentlemen when I supposed it went to the establishment of this department as a check upon the Legislature, and did I comprehend the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, when he cited Judge Paterson’s charge, which I have not seen, but from which, as he read, I noted these words “I hold it to be the duty of the court in such case, to declare the law null and void.” If I have not misunderstood the gentleman, I confess my eyes are now opened. I begin to feel some of those apprehensions which have been so strongly talked about, and which heretofore I have not been accustomed to experience. Not, sir, from a fear of usurpation of power on the part of the Legislature, for they are biennially responsible to their constituents for the sacred observance of the charter of their rights; not, sir, from a fear of usurpation of power on the part of the Executive, for the term of his service is limited to four years, and therefore he is liable to lose his office in case of an infraction of the Constitution on his part, but from a desire which, I fear, this check-department of the Government has to grasp at all power. Give the Judiciary this check upon the Legislature, allow them the power to declare your laws null and void; allow the common law, a system extending to all persons and to all things, to be attached to the Constitution, as I understand it is contended; and in vain have the people placed you upon this floor to legislate; your laws will be nullified, your proceedings will be checked. As long as the office exists the judge holds it during good behaviour; he is, then, independent. Being independent, and not having that degree of responsibility attached to his office which is attached to the Legislature or to the Executive, the powers granted by the Constitution are to be strictly construed; nothing is to be left to implication; nothing to construction; the letter is to determine the extent of their power, and I conceive it never was intended they should transcend it. I have, sir, looked into the Constitution with a scrutinizing eye, to discern, if possible, whence these pretensions are derived. There are but two clauses of the Constitution, which can even give a pretence for the power which is contended for. The first is as follows:

“The Judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority.”

To declare a law null and void is certainly not such a case, either in law or equity, arising under the Constitution, as was contemplated to be embraced by the paragraph I have cited. It will be in vain to say that, without such a construction, the Constitution cannot be satisfied. I am not now to learn that there are two descriptions of cases which will be fully sufficient to satisfy the terms there expressed, in their utmost extent, as where cases shall arise between citizens of different States, or between citizens and foreigners, which are to be decided either by State laws or by foreign laws; or where cases shall arise between citizens of the same State in consequence of an unconstitutional exercise of power on the part of the State, in emitting and making bills of credit a lawful tender. The other clause of the Constitution is as follows:

“This Constitution and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, &c., shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby.”

This, certainly, from the words with which it concludes, was intended as an instruction or direction to the judges of the State courts; and if they were transposed, perhaps, would more fully communicate the intention of their framers, reading in this form: “The judges in any State shall be bound by this Constitution,” &c. Is there any reasonable person, sir, after this explanation, will say that by either or both of these clauses a power is given to your Judiciary to declare your laws null and void? They may, to be sure, for a while impede the passage of a law, by a decision against its constitutionality; yet, notwithstanding the law is in force, is not nullified, and will be acted upon whenever there is a change of opinion. The Legislative, Executive, and Judicial departments should be kept separate and distinct. This I agree to, it has become an axiom in politics that they should. Yet, I inquire, will this be the case if you allow to the Judiciary the power to annul your laws, and contend that the common law is attached to the Constitution? I am persuaded you thereby concentrate all power in one department. The common law is the Constitution, and the court may, if they please, declare it void.

But I have not heard it explained whether the common law simply, without statutory amendments, or the common law with statutory amendments, or with what statutory amendments, is to be attached to the Constitution? I believe it is intended they have a right to apply such parts of it as are applicable to the Constitution. The common law extends to all persons and all things. The judges have the right of adopting this law, or such parts as they may deem applicable; they can annul your laws. If these powers are really contended for on the part of the Judiciary, and if these powers should ever be conceded, they would without doubt possess an unlimited and uncontrollable power of legislation. I am free for my own part to declare, that I had rather live under the government of a lenient despot than such a government of judges. And if those powers are really contended for, I feel no hesitation in informing you, Mr. Chairman, that this is the tree where despotism lies concealed. And this, too, is the auspicious moment when those branches shall be pruned away, which of late have vegetated with extraordinary luxuriance. But, sir, nurture it with your treasure, stop not its ramifications, and suffer me seriously to inquire, What will be the consequence? It will overshadow your extensive Republic; your soil will become too sterile for the plant of liberty; your atmosphere will be contaminated with its poisonous effluvia, and your soaring eagle will fall dead at its root.

Mr. DAVIS.—Mr. Chairman, I beg leave to be indulged with a few remarks on this subject, which I shall submit with great diffidence, being sensible of my incompetency to illustrate a subject of such immense importance; but as I am to give a vote, the reasons that govern that vote I think it my duty to express. I rejoice that we are called upon to decide this great national question at a time when the public mind is calm and tranquil, when, uninfluenced by extrinsic circumstances, we can settle a principle of such magnitude to our country.

I did hope we should have taken up this subject with cool deliberation, and I have to lament that the honorable gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. HENDERSON) who opened the debate, instead of appealing to our sober reflections, sounded the trump of alarm. That honorable member told us we were about to prostrate the Constitution. If this really be the case, the sound of danger is proper, and we, who are about to do it, must expect to answer it to our country, and to generations yet unborn. But above all, we must expect to answer for it in a day of awful reckoning. The honorable member told us “that the spirit that had rode on the whirlwind and directed the storm—the spirit that had brought twenty millions of people to bow to a single despot—had entered this House on the seventh day of December last, and with gigantic strides was bearing down all before it.” When the honorable member spoke of this tremendous spirit, I was at a loss how to understand him. I thought he alluded to a spirit that a few years ago threatened to humble my parent State in dust and ashes, because her citizens refused to sing praises to the late Administration, and own its superior wisdom and patriotism. But when the gentleman spoke of twenty millions of people, I found he alluded to the French nation. On a subject where the interest of the United States is alone concerned, and which furnishes matter for the most brilliant or diffusive genius, I wonder that gentlemen will not confine themselves to America, and not seek for occurrences among the transatlantic nations. But I ask that honorable member if he is now prepared to degrade that spirit so much approved by the Great Washington of America, that in addressing a late Minister of that nation, he spoke the following words: “To call your nation brave is but to pronounce common fame. Wonderful people!” Is he prepared to degrade a spirit that resisted the union of Kings and Emperors against an infant Republic? This, as well as other remarks, are foreign to the subject, but deserve to be considered. The honorable member then told us that everything that bore the majesty of the people was about to be destroyed. The excise, he says, pledged to pay the national debt, is to be repealed. Has that honorable member forgotten the agitations that this excise law cost the public? Has he forgotten that the prison of Philadelphia was filled with those who resisted the law? Has he forgotten that citizen was armed against citizen, and State against State, to enforce this law, and that it was carried into execution at the point of the bayonet? Does that gentleman think the majesty of the people consists in holding the law in one hand and the sword in the other, and ruling the nation with a rod of iron? The Mint, he says, is to be knocked down. Surely he does not remember that it cost us twenty-one thousand dollars per annum, and renders us no service. Does he think the majesty of the people consists in useless expensive establishments from which no good has, or ever will result?

H. OF R.

Judiciary System.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

The gentleman then reads the Constitution, and tells us the acceptance of the office of judge, is a contract between the Government and the individual who undertakes the office. The words on which he relies are, “the judges of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour,” hence he infers that the Government is obliged to continue the office to the judge as long as he behaves well, whether it has anything for him to do or not; and that to take the office from him is a violation of the contract and Constitution. Let me examine this principle and see to what it leads. If it be a contract, it is equally binding on the judge and Government; if the words “shall hold his office during good behaviour,” mean that the Government shall continue the office during that time, it must also mean that the judge shall fill the office during that time, and that he cannot resign without first misbehaving, which is not correct; because we know that judges have resigned, and have been removed by more eligible appointments; neither of which could be done, if the principle be a sound one; for then the contract operates unequally, as the Government is bound to continue an office, and the judge is at liberty to vacate when he pleases. If therefore it is a contract between the judge and Government, to make it equal, the Government should have the right to abolish the office when it thought it expedient, and the judge the right to vacate it when he thought proper; and this I hold to be the proper ground. But I make a material distinction between removing a judge from office and abolishing the office; the first implies guilt, the latter that the office is useless, and abolishing it imports no blame to the judge. The office is created by act of law; the appointment to fill it is by Constitutional authority; to remove a judge without proper complaint would be wrong, but to abolish an office created by law, when found useless or inexpedient, would be proper. The gentleman reads further, “And shall receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.” It is worthy of remark, that the word compensation is not annexed to the word office, but is attached to the word services.

This evinces to my mind that the compensation is for services to be performed by the judges, and not for holding the office. Thus, when we abolish the office, we leave no services for him to perform; but he retains his commission, which we have no power to wrest from him, and the latter words go to prove it, “shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.” The word compensation being attached to the word service, to complete the right to compensation, there must be an office of judge, and services rendered in that office. When this law we are about to repeal passed, this seems to have been the opinion of those who passed it. For by a Legislative act they abolished the district courts in Tennessee and Kentucky, and created circuit courts in their stead, and directed the judges of the district courts to perform circuit court services. Where, let me ask, is the difference between our abolishing courts and a former majority doing it? This I take to be the only difference, we abolish courts and do not order judges to do services in other courts. The last Congress abolished courts and then seized the power confided by the Constitution to the President and Senate, namely, the appointment of judges in certain newly created courts.

But it is said the law of last session is admitted to be Constitutional, and that we have no power to repeal it. Look at the second section of this law, and compare it with the Constitution, and no candid man will declare it Constitutional. The original jurisdiction given by that section to the judges of the Supreme Court exceeds those intended by the Constitution. [Here Mr. DAVIS read the law and Constitution.] Besides this I think there is an infraction of the Constitution in the

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

twenty-seventh section, as well as in that part which relates to the judges of Tennessee and Kentucky before alluded to. As to the right of repealing, I cannot hesitate, because I believe this Congress possesses equal power with the former, and that the power of making and repealing laws is at all times vested in the Legislature. If this be not the case, we lose the benefit of experience, the only faithful guide to human concerns. Most of our statutes are experimentally adopted, and when we find that they operate disadvantageously, we doubtless have the power of repealing. The Constitution in giving power to Congress says, they shall have power to "provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." In another place it says, "Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into effect the foregoing powers." Those powers are to provide for the general welfare. Now we think, to provide for the general welfare, we ought to make a law declaring the late Judiciary law repealed. Again, it has often been said, that our Government depends very much on the opinion of the people. This Government is divided into three distinct departments. A late ruling party, finding their power about to be wrested from their hands by the people who elect the Representatives and the State who elect the Senators, in the last moments of power passes a law by which they completely take hold of one entire branch of our Government, and fill it with men whose politics are at war with the people. There a majority does not rule; the minority in defiance of the majority hold one branch. I ask, if this is compatible with general opinion or the settled principles of our Government? The honorable member from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HEMPHILL,) in his argument, puts me in mind of the boy who fights his shadow; he raised arguments for us, and then combatted them; the man who runs by himself is sure to win, so the gentleman was sure to triumph, because he took for us the weakest ground, and for himself the strongest. Those who read his speech will suppose the arguments he combatted had been advanced on this floor; but the fact is otherwise; he was the third who spoke, and all who hear me know that the ground he took and called ours, was not occupied by any of us. Is this a fair and candid manner of acting? He tells us that besides the judiciary laws there are other laws that Congress cannot repeal; that a State is admitted into the Union by law, and that there is no power can repeal that law; that a man is admitted to citizenship by law, and no repeal of that law can affect the citizen. The reason is obvious. If a law admits a State into the Union, and the State comes in according to the provisions of the law, the law having had its effect, having discharged its functions, it becomes dead and cannot be repealed. But if Congress should now say the Northwest Territory should, in the year 1806, be admitted into the Union as a State, at any time before the law takes effect the repeal is in the power of Congress. The same may be said as to citizenship. I found my opinion of the expediency of repealing the Judiciary law, on another reason in addition to that of the courts being unnecessary; I mean the power they declare they have, in the language of Judge Patterson, to "declare a law null and void." Never can I subscribe to that opinion. Never can I believe the Judiciary paramount to both branches of the Legislature; if it is, I have yet to learn it: there is an end to legislation; a knave or a fool can make void your best and most wholesome laws. In the present state of things, how will it affect us? The minority possessing one department of Government, completely frustrates the views of the other two, and governs the nation against the will of the people and the Legislative and Executive power. I am willing to admit the Judiciary to be co-ordinate with the Legislature in this respect, to wit, that judges thinking a law unconstitutional are not bound to execute it; but not to declare it null and void. That power rests alone with the Legislature. But we are told this Judiciary is necessary to check this House and the Senate, and to protect the people against their worst enemies. This is saying to the people, you are incapable of governing yourselves, your representatives are incapable of doing it; in the Judiciary alone you find a safe deposit for your liberties; and saying also, that the Judiciary is the vitals of the nation, wherein all power, all safety dwells; that the Legislature is subordinate thereto and a mere nominal thing, a shadow without substance, its acts perfectly within the control of the Judiciary. I tremble at such ideas. The sooner we put men out of power, who we find determined to act in this manner, the better; by doing so we preserve the power of the Legislature, and save our nation from the ravages of an uncontrolled Judiciary.

Mr. BACON.—In this bill two important inquiries are involved.

1. Is it consistent with the Constitution? 2. Is it expedient to repeal those acts?

Before I proceed to speak directly to either of these questions, I must take the liberty to advert to an important observation made yesterday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HEMPHILL.) In his very decent and ingenious speech with which he then favored the Committee, he gave an explanation of the terms office and court. Indeed very much depends, as I conceive, on fixing accurate ideas to those particular terms. Until this is done, that part of the Constitution which applies to the present subject, must remain in a great measure unintelligible, to me at least. Fixing the true meaning of these terms, will, I conceive, go far towards solving any doubt that may exist relative to the constitutionality of the present bill. This idea, there is reason to believe, did not escape the discerning mind of that worthy gentleman, when he observed, that "office consists in certain power, jurisdiction and authority, conferred on a person, requiring certain duties. The court, the name of the institution, wherein that office is to be exercised. The name of the court may be changed, and also the place where first holden, and the office be exercised in another place."

Those were the words which he used. I fully accede to his explanation of the term office, but very much doubt the correctness of his explanation of the term court, as it is used in the Constitution. And I am not certain but that the question of constitutionality will very much depend upon the idea that is affixed to this identical term. I believe the term court, as it is used in that instrument, means something more than a mere name. Although I will not undertake to give an authoritative and perfectly accurate explanation of the term, yet I may venture to say, that, as used in the Constitution, and in the law proposed to be repealed, it seems to convey the idea of an institution ordained and established for the legal administration of justice. Those things termed courts in the Constitution, are vested with power, and are to exercise jurisdiction, original and appellate. These are attributes which, to my mind, indicate something more than what is merely nominal. I have considered courts as being composed of persons vested with power, jurisdiction and authority, and of whom certain duties are required, that is, as being composed or consisting of officers, particularly of judges; and I am apprehensive that it would be not less difficult to conceive of a court, in the meaning of the Constitution, as existing without officers, than it would to conceive of a Legislature without legislators, or of an officer without an office. If this is not a true, and the only explanation of the term court, as used in the Constitution and in the act referred to in the present bill, I shall wish to hear it otherwise explained. If the explanation is just, I believe it will be found in the sequel of debate to go towards a determination of the question relative to the constitutionality of the bill now under consideration.

I will now, sir, proceed to speak directly to the subject of the bill; and will consider in the first place, the constitutionality of repealing the act therein referred to.

If it should be found to be unconstitutional to repeal those acts, no consideration of expediency ought to have the least weight. As to the mere unconstitutionality of the measure, I am apprehensive this will be found not to be a question of vast intricacy and inexplicable doubt, unless we are disposed to make it such.

There are some things relating to this question, and which may tend in some measure to illustrate the subject, about which there can be no reasonable doubt. It will probably be admitted that the Constitution does not require the Legislature to furnish business sufficient to employ the time and talents of all the judges of all the courts of the United States, let their number be ever so great. It will probably be also admitted, that the Legislature are not restricted by the Constitution from so amending and altering the laws from time to time, as may on the one hand tend to diminish, and on the other to increase the business to be transacted in our judiciary courts respectively, nor are they restricted from transferring business from one judiciary court to another. And if the Legislature may, by way of transfer, or otherwise, diminish or withdraw one part of the business from a judiciary court, they may on the same general principle withdraw another, unless specially restricted by the Constitution. Consequently they may, if they see fit, withdraw the whole in the same way.

All this, it is believed, will not only be readily admitted, but that precedents, from the actual exercise of the power of the Legislature which is here mentioned, are abundantly furnished in the act itself which it is proposed to repeal. And a better authority in this particular case, cannot possibly exist, than what is furnished by this act. It is an authority which, as it applies to this particular case, is not inferior to the Constitution itself. It is an authority which can neither be explained away, nor misunderstood. It may with propriety be said, that in this particular case, it is an authority instar omnium; it is indeed equal to all others; because, if I am not mistaken, it absolutely, unequivocally determines the question relative to the constitutionality of the present bill. I should be willing, for myself, to rest the issue entirely on this ground. This is the principal ground that I shall take.

By section tenth of this law, the powers in general which, by the late law, were vested in the former circuit courts, are transferred from those courts to the circuit courts which are established by the present law.

By section twentieth, it is expressly provided that "all actions, suits, process, pleadings, and other proceedings, of what nature and kind soever, depending or existing in any of the present circuit courts of the United States, or in any of the present district courts of the United States, acting as circuit courts, shall be, and hereby are, continued over to the circuit courts established by this act."

By section tenth, it is provided that the circuit courts established by this act shall have cognizance of a great number of causes which were not in like manner cognizable before the former circuit courts, viz: "of all actions cognizable by the judicial authority of the United States, where the matter in dispute is between four and five hundred dollars."

By the twenty-fourth section, it is "enacted that the district courts of the United States, in and for the districts of Tennessee and Kentucky," in particular, "shall be, and hereby are, abolished."

By the twenty-seventh section, "it is further enacted," generally, "that the circuit courts of the United States, heretofore established, shall cease and be abolished."

Here we have a precedent for abolishing, by a single Legislative act, all the judicial courts of a certain description throughout the United States.

In short, sir, the present circuit courts are not only vested with powers different from the former circuit courts, but they are composed of different men; and that while the former judges of these courts are still living, during their good behaviour, and without their resignation, impeachment, or conviction.

All former circuit courts are, by the law in question, ipso facto abolished. If the circuit courts, established by the law in question, are Constitutional courts, as I take for granted they are, then the former circuit courts do not now exist. And what has become of them? They have been annihilated. By what power have they been annihilated? The answer is ready. They have been annihilated by the same power which first gave them existence, and on the same likewise on which the present circuit courts now depend for their continuance in existence. If, as some gentlemen contend, it is a violation of the Constitution for the Legislature to abolish a judicial court, the law itself which it is in contemplation to repeal, must be an unconstitutional law. And I should not suppose it to be a violation of the Constitution for the Legislature to repeal an unconstitutional law.

The act in question, by which the late circuit courts were abolished, and the present circuit courts established, either is, or is not, a Constitutional act. If it is a Constitutional act, then it was not a violation of the Constitution for the last Congress to pass it. And if it was not a violation of the Constitution for the last Congress to pass the act by which they abolished the circuit courts which then were, and established those which now are, it cannot be any more a violation of the Constitution for the present Congress, by repealing that act, to abolish the circuit courts which now are, and to establish new ones. If, on the contrary, the act in question is an unconstitutional act, I should suppose that of itself was a sufficient reason for repealing it; and that the Constitution, instead of forbidding, demands a repeal of it. So that, whether it is or is not a Constitutional act, the result must be the same; to repeal it cannot be a violation of the Constitution.

I am not disposed to play upon terms, nor would I knowingly descend to a strain of mere metaphysical quibbling on this serious and important subject. I may be mistaken, but I feel as if the argument was not only rational, but absolutely conclusive. If it is fallacious, let it be fairly met, and the fallacy will easily be detected. The sentiments which I now express are not the cursory thoughts of a moment, which have occurred on the spur of the occasion. Whether right or wrong, they are the result of serious and mature reflection. If they are not sound, if they are not salutary, if they are not predicated on those principles of the Constitution which are to be considered as immoveable by any authority short of that by which they were first established, let them be rejected with all that abhorrence which the tongue of man can express, or the human mind conceive. For, I readily admit that the effects resulting from a violation of the Constitution by the Legislature are not less, but, if possible, infinitely more to be dreaded than what any gentleman has described.

Questions of this nature, sir, are not to be determined by mere popular declamation, by a flood of metaphors, nor yet by the less attractive force of opprobrious terms. It is ardently to be desired that nothing of this kind may ever be suffered to tarnish the deliberations of this House. The subject before us is such as merits the most impartial, candid, firm, and liberal attention. And such, I hope, it will receive. Admitting that the law in question was passed "in a gust of passion"—"at a midnight hour"—and even with views hostile to the equal rights of a free people—still it ought to be met, if met at all, on principles directly the reverse of all these. Otherwise, the remedy applied may prove to be infinitely worse than the disorder itself of which we complain.

It ought, I think, to be agreed by all, that the judges both of the supreme and of "such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," shall hold their offices during good behaviour; because this is expressly provided for in the Constitution. But, sir, I conceive that, to abolish an office, and to remove an officer from an office while that office exists, are, in the meaning of the Constitution, as well as in common speech, distinct acts, however one of these acts may affect the other. To justify a distinction of this kind, I need only to refer again to the act proposed to be repealed. Is that an act for removing from office a number of judges who, by the Constitution, are entitled to hold their offices during good behaviour? If it is, I will agree with gentlemen on the other side, that it is an unconstitutional act. And I shall expect that, for this reason alone, if there was no other, they will agree with me, that it ought to be repealed. And not only so; but that it is the indispensable duty of the Legislature to repeal it, and to restore those courts which have been thus wantonly abolished, together with the judges who have been thus unconstitutionally removed from office. Even without the aid of the act in question, I believe the distinction between removing an officer and abolishing an office will be found to be a real and obvious one.

Congress are undoubtedly vested with Constitutional power to repeal the act for laying and collecting internal taxes; and in doing this, to abolish all the offices that have been instituted for that purpose. But it will not be pretended that Congress have power, by a Legislative act, either to appoint to, or remove from office, a single officer in that department. A power then to abolish an office, and a power to remove an officer from office are in their nature distinct powers. Admitting therefore, as I really do, that Congress are not, in the meaning of the Constitution, vested with power to remove an officer from office, (whether Judiciary or Executive it matters not,) it will by no means follow that they have not power to repeal the law instituting that office. Should a resolution be brought forward for repealing the law laying duties of excise on stills, &c., would any gentleman who might be opposed to such a resolution, venture to ground his opposition on the unconstitutionality of the measure from this consideration, that it would in effect abolish three-fourths of the offices in the revenue department of the Government, and in this indirect way deprive a host of officers of the offices which the Constitution has placed as much without the power and control of the Legislature, as it has those of the Judiciary department? Sir, I believe not. The argument, however, would be neither more nor less conclusive in one case than in the other. It is urged, within doors and without, that to repeal the law would be no other than an indirect way of removing judicial officers from office, and of destroying that legal tenure by which they hold their offices. This argument, if such it may be called, and if I understand it, takes for granted the principal if not the only matter in dispute, viz: that every Judicial officer has such a tenure in his office, as puts the office itself entirely beyond the power and influence of the Legislature; so that when the Legislature have, by their own Legislative act, once instituted such an office, they can never afterwards abolish or touch that office without violating the Constitution under which they act. This, sir, is a doctrine abhorrent from the principles of all free governments; it is abhorrent from what has been demonstrated, as I conceive, to be consonant to the principles of the Constitution of the United States; it is abhorrent from the sense and uniform practice of the Legislature, ever since our Government was established; it is more especially abhorrent from the express provisions of the act itself, the repeal of which is now in contemplation.

But, sir, permit me to ask, what would be the consequence of adopting the sentiment of our opponents? Would not this be a cunning and indirect way of tying up the hands of the Legislature, and of restricting that body in the exercise of those powers which the Constitution has vested them with for the safety and welfare of the community at large? Would it not be a cunning and indirect way of fixing an immoveable and intolerable burden on the honest and industrious citizens of the United States, for the private emolument of court favorites, and idle sycophants, and useless drones? And would conduct like this in representatives evince a becoming and sacred regard to the spirit of the Constitution, and to the trust reposed in them by their constituents? Or, would it not rather furnish a melancholy instance of the betrayal of both? Let candor, let common sense, let solid learning, let sound policy, decide these solemn queries.

A decision grounded on all, or on any one of these principles, is such as we wish to abide. And I mean not to suggest a doubt but that our opponents are equally disposed to abide the same impartial test. By what I have now said, I mean no more than to express that clear conviction which exists in my own mind, that the principle for which our opponents contend has a natural and direct tendency to such a state of things as I have mentioned, however pure their views may be who contend for it.

Whether the judges will be entitled to retain their offices and to receive their salaries, provided the act should be repealed, is, as I conceive, a question entirely distinct from that which is now before the Committee. It may perhaps hereafter be made a question, either before the Legislature, or before a judicial court. Whenever this shall happen, then will be the proper time to consider it. If from a fair and candid examination of the subject it appears, as I think it does, that there is nothing in the Constitution which in the least degree militates against the repeal of the acts, then the only question which remains to be considered is, whether it is expedient to repeal them.

With respect to this question, I will not go into a minute discussion of it. I will only observe, in general, that from the documents which we are furnished with, and from the present situation and state of the nation in general, it does not appear necessary to retain all the courts which by that law have been constituted. It does not appear but that, to say the least, the business of these courts may be transacted equally well by a less number. And as it is in itself not only imprudent, but unjust, to lay unnecessary burdens on our constituents for the private advantage of individuals; as this would have a natural and most direct tendency to weaken the Government, by destroying the confidence of the citizens in it, and alienating their affections from it, I am, for myself, fully convinced that these laws ought to be repealed, and, with my present views of the subject, I shall give my vote accordingly; although, I confess, I am not entirely satisfied with the act proposed to be revived. And I will here take occasion to say, I should, for myself, wish to add two or three more judges to the Supreme Court, and to strike out of that act the sum of five hundred dollars, and insert a much larger sum. Perhaps something like this may take place, either as an amendment to the present bill, or at some future day. If such an amendment might be obtained, I should be much better pleased with it than I am at present.

Mr. T. MORRIS, of New York.—I did flatter myself when the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. THOMPSON) detailed to this Committee the mode of administering justice in the State which he represents, that he would also have added what the decisions and opinions of the courts of that State have been, on questions analogous to those which we are called upon to decide. But, sir, since that honorable gentleman has thought proper to refer to his own State as far only as arguments drawn from thence could answer his purpose, and has not communicated information which might have been adduced from the same quarter, and much more applicable to the present question, I hope that it will not be deemed presumptuous in me to do it. There is not, sir, a State in the Union where the independence of the judiciary has been more highly valued than in Virginia. There is no part of America where a commission during good behaviour has been construed to confer a more independent official tenure on a judge than in the State to which I have alluded. The construction, sir, which my friends and myself are now contending for, is more fully and completely established by the opinions and decisions of the Virginia judges than it is by those of any other part of the Union. And, sir, if I am entitled to form an opinion from the evidence I hold in my hand of the decisions which have at different times been made by the judges of that State, if I am permitted to draw any conclusion from the universal acquiescence which they have met with from its citizens, I must believe that if a bill similar to the one before us was introduced into the Virginia Assembly, that so far from meeting with the countenance of that body it would be scouted out of it with indignation. Having made these observations, I must entreat the patience of the Committee, while I read the opinions to which I have alluded.

[Here Mr. RANDOLPH asked from what book these opinions were quoted.]

Mr. MORRIS replied, from a "Friend to the Constitution;" and added, that he believed that they were published with a view to this question; that they had been the subject of much examination and conversation, but that he had never heard their authenticity doubted.

Mr. MORRIS then read the following extracts:

"The Constitution of Virginia declares, that 'both Houses of Assembly shall, by joint ballot, appoint judges of the supreme court of appeals, and general court, judges in chancery, judges of admiralty, secretary and attorney general, to be commissioned by the Governor, and continue in office during good behaviour.'"

"The supreme court of appeals in Virginia consisted of the judges of the court of chancery, general court, and court of admiralty, who were by law declared to constitute a court of appeals. The Legislature found the system inconvenient, and determined to change it.

"In 1787 this subject was taken up by the Legislature; a system of circuit courts was adopted, and it was enacted, that the judges of the court of appeals should perform the duty of circuit judges. This law the judges refused to execute as unconstitutional, and agreed unanimously (Edmund Pendleton, George Wythe, John Blair, Paul Carrington, Peter Lyons, William Fleming, Henry Tazewell, Richard Cary, James Henry, and John Tyler, being present,) on a remonstrance, from which will be extracted such parts as are deemed applicable to the present inquiry."

"In deciding the act, the judges declare that the Constitution and the act are in opposition, and cannot exist together; and that the former must control the operation of the latter."

"The propriety and necessity of the independence of the judges is evident in reason and the nature of the office; since they are to decide between government and the people, as well as between contending citizens; and if they be dependent on either, corrupt influence may be apprehended, sacrificing the innocent to popular prejudice, and subjecting the poor to oppression and persecution by the rich: and this applies more forcibly to exclude dependence on the Legislature, a branch of which, in cases of impeachment, is itself a party."

"The people, continues the Court of Appeals, 'have, in their form of government, declared that the judges should hold their offices during good behaviour.' Their dependence would have been rendered complete by fixing the quantum of their salaries."

"On a subsequent occasion a contest, not very different in principle, arose, in the same State, between the Legislative and Judicial Departments, in which the point in controversy was again yielded by the Legislature."

"In 1794 it was enacted that the judges of the district courts, who are also judges of the general court, should so far exercise chancery jurisdiction as to grant injunctions to their own judgments, and decree finally, in cases of an equitable nature, which originated by way of injunction.

"It will be recollected, that by the Constitution of Virginia, the two Houses of Assembly, 'by joint ballot appoint judges of the supreme court of appeals and general court, judges in chancery,' &c.

"Under the act just stated, an application was made to the district court at Dumfries for an injunction, which was referred to the general court, and, on solemn consideration, was unanimously rejected, on the principle that the law was unconstitutional. In giving their opinions, some of the judges stated reasons entirely applicable to the subject we are now considering.

"Judge Roane observed, 'Though a judge is interested privately in preserving his independence, yet it is the right of the people which should govern him; who, in their sovereign character, have provided that the judges should be independent: so that, in fact, it is a controversy between the Legislature and the people, though perhaps the judges may be privately interested.

"If there can be judges in chancery, who have, on commission, during good behaviour, their tenure in office is absolutely at the will of the Legislature, and they consequently are not independent. The people of Virginia intended that the Judiciary should be independent of the other departments. They are to judge where the Legislature is a party, and therefore should be independent of it; otherwise they might judge corruptly in order to please the Legislature, and be consequently continued in office. It is an acknowledged principle in all countries that no man shall be judge in his own cause; but it is nearly the same thing where the tribunal of justice is under the influence of a party. If the Legislature can transfer from Constitutional to Legislative courts, all judicial powers, these dependent tribunals, being the creatures of the Legislature itself, will not dare to oppose an unconstitutional law."

"Judge Tyler.—The Constitution says, that 'judges in chancery shall be appointed by joint ballot of both Houses of Assembly, and commissioned by the Governor during good behaviour;' and for the most valuable purpose—to secure the 'independence of the Judiciary.' Contrary to this express direction, which admits of no doubt, implication, or nice construction, that bane to political freedom, the Legislature, has made the appointment by an act mandatory to the judges, leaving them not at liberty to accept or refuse the office conferred, which is a right every citizen enjoys in every other case; a right too sacred to be yielded to any power on earth; but were I willing to do it, as relates to myself, as a judge I ought not, because it would frustrate that important object beforementioned, intended by the Constitution to be kept sacred, for the wisest and best of purposes: to wit, that justice and the law be done to all manner of persons, without fear or reward. For how would the right of individuals stand when brought in contest with the public, or even an influential character, if the judges may be removed from office by the same power which appointed them, to wit, by a statute appointment, as in this case, and by a statute disappointment, as was the case in the courts of appeals? Might not danger be apprehended from this source when future times shall be more corrupt?" "Let me now compare the law with the Constitution in another point; that of the want of a commission during good behaviour, and the reasons will fully and forcibly apply. When I receive the commission I see the ground on which I stand; I see that my own integrity is that ground, and no opinions but such as are derived from base motives can be sufficient to remove me from office; in which case, whensoever an appeal is made to me by an injured citizen, I will do him justice as far as my mental powers will enable me to discover it, without any apprehensions of an unjust attack."

FEBRUARY, 1802.

"Judge Tucker, in a very elaborate opinion, which will do credit to his talents so long as it shall be read, thus expressed himself:

"The independence of the Judiciary results from the tenure of their office, which the Constitution declares shall be during good behaviour. The offices which they are to fill must therefore be permanent as the Constitution itself, and not liable to be discontinued or annihilated by any other branch of the Government. Hence the Constitution has provided that the Judiciary department should be arranged in such a manner as not to be subject to Legislative control. The court of appeals, court of chancery, and a general court, are tribunals expressly required by it; and in these courts the Judiciary power is either immediately or ultimately vested.

"These courts can neither be annihilated nor discontinued by any Legislative act, nor can the judges of them be removed from their office for any cause except a breach of their good behaviour."

"But if the Legislature might at any time discontinue or annihilate either of these courts, it is plain that their tenure of office might be changed, since a judge, without any breach of good behaviour, might in effect be removed from office by annihilating or discontinuing the office itself."

Mr. MORRIS then proceeded: I have stated these opinions at full length, because I conceive that they determine every principle that we are contending for. We find, sir, the ablest judges who have graced the bench of Virginia, deliberately declaring acts of the Legislature of that State unconstitutional. We find them contending for, and maintaining their independence against all legislative attempts to lessen or destroy it. We find them claiming this independence from the words of a Constitution, which declares that they shall be commissioned during good behaviour. We find, also, that in a contest on this subject between the Legislature and the Judiciary, that the latter prevailed; from whence we have a right to infer, that the public sentiment was with the judges. Why then, Mr. Chairman, are most of the gentlemen who represent that State, anxious to divest the General Government of a privilege so highly valued in their own State? Is the independence of the national Judiciary of less importance than that of Virginia? I trust it is not. A State Judiciary, according to the opinion of the Virginia judges, has to protect a citizen against the Government as well as to decide between citizen and citizen. What have the national tribunals to do? Why, sir, they have not only to protect a citizen against a State government, not only to protect him also against the General Government, but, sir, they may be even called upon to decide between a State and the General Government. These are the great purposes for which your Constitution has vested your Judiciary with powers independent of other departments of the Government, that it may effectually interpose between the meanest of your citizens and secure them against the oppression either of an arbitrary Legislature or a tyrannical Executive.

Sir, previous to the commitment of this bill, when an incidental question arose on it in the House, an honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) spoke of the present as a very favorable moment for us to determine this great Constitutional question. An honorable gentleman from Kentucky has this day expressed the same sentiment. Sir, I cannot agree with either of these honorable gentlemen. I believe that this is of all moments the most unfortunate for such a determination. I believe so, because such have been the fatal effects of Executive persecution, that it has wrought up party spirit to its highest pitch of irritation. [Here there was a cry of order from different parts of the House.]

Mr. MORRIS observed that he did not mean to say anything that was disorderly, but that having occasion to allude to the present state of irritation of the public mind, he could not help attributing it to what he believed to be the true cause of it. Mr. M. then proceeded: Sir, I am incapable of attributing to a majority of this House a settled determination of violating the Constitution of their country, but I do believe that if they act from the impulse of the present moment, that valuable instrument will be sacrificed at the altar of resentment. And how can this belief be resisted, when you hear so respectable a gentleman as the honorable member from Kentucky so far get the better of his usual discretion as to permit himself to say in his place, that with the public sentiment judges and other officers ought to be changed, and that he would vote for the bill because in no other way can judges be driven from their posts? Sir, such a sentiment expressed on the floor of this House, is of itself convincing, that gentlemen are not in a state of mind to examine this subject coolly and dispassionately, and therefore I must repeat again, that it is the most unfortunate of all moments for its discussion.

The further consideration of the bill was then postponed till to-morrow.

a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War on the subject of certain lands in the neighborhood of our military posts, on which it might be expedient for the Legislature to make some provisions. A letter was also received from the Governor of Indiana, on the same subject. The said Message and letter were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

THE JUDICIARY BILL.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States and for other purposes."

Mr. STANLEY.—Mr. Chairman, the impression I feel of the importance of the question at present before us, would alone induce me to assign the reasons of the vote which I shall give; but, sir, I am urged by another strong reason to justify that vote. The Legislature of the State of North Carolina, a part of which I have the honor to represent, has thought proper to recommend to her Representatives on this floor, to use their endeavors to effect the measure contemplated by the bill on your table for the repeal of the act of the last Congress, entitled "An act for the more convenient organization of the Courts of the United States." Holding myself responsible to my constituents for the vote which I shall give on this, as on every other question, I cannot admit the right of any other authority, however respectable, to control, or in any manner to influence my conduct. The high respect I feel, and which is justly due to the honorable body which has made this recommendation, has induced me to review, with deliberation and caution, the opinion I had formed, and though it is painful to differ from those whom I esteem, yet my duty to my constituents compels me to do so in this instance. I owe, also, a duty to myself, to give no vote which my conscience and my understanding do not approve.

Every measure which is brought under the consideration of a Legislature must first be tested by its expediency. Unhappily, in the present instance, another question arises—its constitutionality. I will endeavor, concisely, to examine the subject on both those points. And, first, as to the expediency of this measure. In order to form a correct estimate between the present Judiciary system of the courts of the United States and that for which it was substituted, it is proper to take a comparative view of both.

Under the former system, there were six judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, who held two sessions of the Supreme Court in each year, at the seat of Government. Those judges also held in each State a circuit court, two terms in each year, in which the judge of the district was associated with the circuit judge. The organization of the district courts having jurisdiction, principally, of matters affecting the revenue and admiralty causes, not being connected with the present question, need not be examined. From the errors of this system resulted, first, a delay of justice. The judges bound to hold courts in succession at remote parts of the continent, were continually travelling; from the variety of accidents to which travellers are subjected in this country, from the condition of roads and overflowing of rivers, it frequently happened that the judges failed in their attempts to get to the courts, or arrived so late that little business was done. Suitors, jurors, and witnesses, were subjected to the trouble and expense of attending courts without the accomplishment of their business; hence resulted a delay of justice. In the State to which I belong, during the few years existence of the former system, this was the case frequently.

Another great evil resulting from that system was, its tendency to lessen the character and respectability of the Federal bench. Those best acquainted with the profession of the law will most readily admit, that even a life of patient study is unequal to the complete attainment of principles and rules; and that much labor and industry are necessary to preserve that which is gained. Consequently, that extent of legal knowledge, correctness of judgment, and respectability of character, which should designate the persons qualified for this important trust were seldom to be found, but in men far advanced in years. Men possessing these qualifications, not inured to labor, are seldom equal to the fatigue of their duty; or, if at the time of appointment, fast approaching to the infirmities of age, were not to be expected to relinquish the enjoyments of private life for an office, which, however honorable, subjected them to the fatigue of a day laborer. The office, with its incumbrances, was, as it were, offered to the lowest bidder. And men best qualified to honor the bench, were driven from it. True it is, men have been found eminently uniting virtue and talents, who have accepted the office under all its distressing circumstances, but we owe this rather to their patriotism than to the advantages of the situation. Let it also be remembered that, in some instances, gentlemen who would have adorned the seat of justice of any country, were compelled to relinquish their seats; and in others, refused to accept the appointment.

Another error of that system was, that the judges of the Supreme Court, the court in the last resort, before whom the errors of the inferior circuit courts were to be corrected, were the same men who presided in those circuit courts. With great deference for the opinions of gentlemen who prefer that system, I pronounce my opinion, that its errors were radical; that those who justly estimated the importance to our interest and national character, of a speedy and correct administration of justice, ought to have desired a change. The present system has happily obviated these errors. The States are divided into six circuits; in each State is appointed one judge, called a circuit judge; the judges of the States, composing one circuit, ride together into the States of their circuit, and together hold the court. The much smaller distance which those judges have to travel than the circuit judges, under the former system, secures their due attendance; a portion of their time is left them to study and reflection, and the same persons presiding at successive terms, a uniformity of decision is preserved. The six former judges hold the Supreme Court, with original Constitutional jurisdiction in matters of the utmost national importance, and appellate jurisdiction, in certain cases, where the sum in dispute is two thousand dollars; they are also the court in which the errors of the circuit court are examined and corrected.

If, sir, the organization of the circuit courts could have been improved by a system preferable to the present, it is my misfortune not yet to have heard of it. I will now, sir, examine the objections which are urged against the present system, and the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. DAVIS) must pardon me, if, in doing so, I notice some not yet advanced on this floor; which, though he is pleased to term "shadows," have yet been imposed on the American people for substance. The honorable member from Virginia (Mr. THOMPSON) has charged this system with a great increase of expense. What, sir, is the amount of this increase of expense? The estimate from the Treasury Department informs us that the salaries of the judges created under the act of last Congress, and the addition made to the salaries of the judges of Tennessee, Kentucky, and Northwest Territory, amount to thirty-two thousand dollars. Some contingent expenses are necessary, which cannot be estimated at more than eight thousand dollars; making, together, the sum of forty thousand dollars; a sum which, when compared with the magnitude of the object, or the vast revenue and resources of the country, becomes an atom, the dust of the balance. But, sir, permit me to ask, when was it discovered that the people of America were so sordid as to consider their gold their chief good? I had believed, sir, they justly estimated it the instrument by which their good might be promoted. When we took the field for independence, did any cool calculator estimate the cost? Is our Republican Government, founded on, and guaranteeing, the equal rights of man, preferred, because of its cheapness? No, sir; with the honest pride of an American, I reply, they act from nobler motives. If the purpose on which the money is bestowed be necessary, the people ought to submit to the expense; for an improvement in so valuable an institution as the Judiciary, by which the weak and the poor are protected against the great and the opulent, the people will submit to it.

The President has laid before us a document, exhibiting the business which has been decided in the Federal courts, with a statement of what was pending when this document was taken. I shall say nothing further of the errors which have been detected in this document, than that I do not attribute them to the Executive; as he received it, I presume, he submitted it to us. But, sir, I cannot but express my admiration of the novelty, if not the solidity of the argument, founded on this document, that courts are necessary and useful, in proportion to the quantity of business before them. Can gentlemen believe that because, at the time of taking these statements, there was less business than there had been before, that, therefore, litigation would decline; that nothing would exist but peace and good will among men? If this is not believed; if commerce will continue, and passion rule us, so long will there be litigation, so long will there be a necessity for courts; their existence will be beneficial, though without business; they show to the citizens and to the world, that we are prepared to punish crimes and administer justice; and it becomes our duty to establish that system which shall best promote the great objects of a speedy and correct administration of justice. The argument drawn from this document is fallacious on another ground; the paucity of suits is owing, not to the want of litigation on questions within Federal jurisdiction, but because of the erroneous organization of the courts under the former system, suitors were driven into the State courts.

The same honorable member from Virginia, has told us the former courts were sufficient; and, to establish his point, has adduced evidence from that respectable State, the Ancient Dominion; the gentleman tells us that, in that State, one venerable man has the whole extensive chancery jurisdiction of the State, the docket of which contains 2,600 causes. Without inquiring what portion of this multitude of business the judge is able to perform, I do not hesitate to say, the fact can have no weight, in establishing the gentleman's argument. We did not complain, sir, that, under the former system, the judges had too extensive a jurisdiction, nor that there was a multitude of causes; but that the discharge of their duty, however limited their jurisdiction, however few the causes, compelled them to a perpetual travelling, leaving them no time for study, and subjecting the courts to delay; though their jurisdiction had been limited to one species of action only, and the business in court reduced to a single cause, the labor and uncertainty of travelling from New Hampshire to Georgia was still the same.

It is objected against the act proposed to be repealed, that a dangerous patronage is created by it for the President. I shall pass over what I consider an inconsistency in this objection coming from gentlemen who profess that implicit confidence is due to the man chosen by the people, who, in his appointments, speaks not less the voice of the people than the voice of God, and examine the weight of the objection. If this apprehended patronage means the power of appointing the Judiciary, that power is given by the Constitution, and is the same, whether the power of the Judiciary be vested in six or in sixteen judges. If it fear an undue control over the people in favor of the Executive, through the Judiciary, make the judges as independent as we contend they are and ought to be, and they are placed beyond the necessity of descending to the practice of improper means to preserve Executive favor.

We have been told, sir, that it is necessary the judges should ride into the States to gain a knowledge of the laws by which, in many cases, they are to decide. Until this occasion I have never heard that the laws of a country could only be acquired in the atmosphere of that country where they are in force. Nine-tenths of the decisions in our State courts and Federal courts turn on questions of common law; yet, has it ever been suggested that an American judge was incompetent to decide on common law questions, because he had not studied in England? No, sir, the knowledge in both cases may be acquired in the closet. To these observations permit me to add, that the remonstrances from the bar of Philadelphia, composed of gentlemen no less celebrated for the respectability of their private than of their professional character, who, on this occasion, so interesting to the welfare of their country, have sacrificed their political prejudices, strongly expressing their decided preference of the present system to the former, is, to my mind, conclusive, that it ought to be preferred. I am, therefore, of opinion, that it is inexpedient to pass the present repealing bill; and so long as my opinion is supported by the respectable authority I have just alluded to, and opposed only by the objections which I have noticed, I shall feel satisfied that opinion is correct.

In approaching the second question which I proposed to examine—the constitutionality of the measure—whether I reflect on the magnitude of the question on the one hand, or my inability on the other, I am, indeed, humbled before the undertaking.

Without examining whether Government, according to the modern opinion, should be founded on the reason and sense of justice of man, it is certain our Government is calculated to guard against his weakness and his wickedness. Our Government has been particularly cautious on this subject; it has left nothing to the hazard of reason or sense of justice; it has carefully delegated powers to three distinct departments, and separated these departments by boundaries plainly marked and formed, each so as not to control, at least to check, the other. The Legislative powers, though vested in men chosen frequently and by the people themselves in one branch, and by the immediate agents of the people in the other, are nevertheless the object of suspicion and caution. Their powers, far from resting on their discretion or sense of expediency, are expressly and cautiously limited. The Executive conditional veto forms one check on the Legislature; the Judiciary, I shall contend, are a check on both. Here, permit me to say, that from the spirit and the words of our Constitution, I infer that the Judiciary are a co-ordinate department with the Executive and Legislative. The framers of our Constitution, satisfied that the powers of well organized Governments ought to be divided into three branches—Legislative, Executive, and Judicial—have nowhere expressly declared there shall be such departments, but, after premising the objects of the Government, proceed to ordain how the Legislature shall be composed; and article two, section two, declares, "The power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America; he shall hold his office during the term of four years," and prescribes the mode of election. Article three, section one, also declares, "The Judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," and the judges of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold, &c., during good behaviour. By comparing these sections of the Constitution, it appears the Judiciary and the Executive are expressly created by the Constitution, and nothing is left to the discretion of Congress, as to the existence of these departments; they are created by the same words; and if the Legislature claim a right to put down the Judiciary at pleasure, before the happening of that event till which the Constitution secures their offices—their misbehaviour—they may as well assume the right to remove the President before the happening of that event till which his office is secured, to wit, the expiration of four years. I shall attempt to establish as a first principle, that the Judiciary are a check on the Legislature, and thence to show first, that, by the spirit of our Constitution, the Judiciary ought to be independent, beyond the control or influence of either of the other departments of power; and, secondly, that, by the words of the Constitution, they are so secured.

First, then, that the Judiciary are a check on the Legislature. In the Constitution, we find certain powers delegated to Congress; we also find they are prohibited from exercising certain powers; among which are, they shall pass no ex post facto law, no bill of attainder, no law respecting religion, &c. Should, unhappily, a Legislature be found who, from weakness or wickedness, or the union of both, should transgress the bounds prescribed, what is the security of the citizen? After all the experience derived from the example of other Governments, after all the deliberation and wisdom of our sages who framed the Constitution, are we left, in this important instance, as under the despotism of a monarch, to seek redress through the throes and convulsions of a revolution? No, sir. The Judiciary are our security. The Legislature may enact penalties, and denounce punishments against those who do not yield obedience to their unconstitutional acts; their penalties cannot be exacted, nor punishments inflicted, without the judgment of a court. The judges are to expound the law, and that fundamental, paramount law, the Constitution. To this purpose they are sworn to support the Constitution. While the Judiciary firmly, independently, and uprightly, discharge their duty and declare the act of the Legislature contrary to the Constitution, to be void, the Legislature are checked, and the citizen shielded from oppression and persecution. But, ask gentlemen whence do the courts derive this power, and the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. THOMPSON) says, we are contending for this common law doctrine, that the courts are a check on the Legislature. If I misunderstood the gentleman, I trust he will correct me. Sir, that gentleman, I am willing to presume, knows, what I assure him no gentleman with whom on this occasion I act, is ignorant of, that this is not a common law doctrine; that in England their courts have no check on the Legislature—their Parliament are emphatically styled omnipotent, and if they violate the few natural rights that remain to the citizens, they have no remedy but in a resort to revolutionary principles; it was the want of this check to the oppressions of their rulers, which has produced civil wars, and driven one monarch from his kingdom, and sent another to the scaffold. This power exists in no other Government, because under no other Government does there exist a Legislature with limited powers; under our Government it is the very essence, the constitution of a court, the oath enjoined on them to support the Constitution. The exercise and the admission of this right are not new in America; instances must be in the recollection of every gentleman. I will cite a few most prominent: The honorable member (Mr. THOMPSON) has been pleased to call the attention of the Committee to the examples drawn from his State; I beg leave to profit from the same source. In 1787, the Legislature of that State passed an act making new arrangements in the jurisdiction of the courts. The judges, among whom was that venerable gentleman mentioned by the member from that State, whose merits and worth command the sincere homage of my respects, protested against this act, and refused to carry it into effect; the Legislature acquiesced, and the law was repealed.

Upon the imposition of the carriage tax by Congress, a citizen of Virginia refused to pay the tax, on the ground that it was unconstitutionally laid. He was sued for the penalty in the circuit court of that State, from whence, by writ of error, the suit came before the Supreme Court; in this case the defendant relied solely on the unconstitutionality of the act of Congress, and on this ground was defended by the attorney general of the State of Virginia, and the attorney general of the State of Pennsylvania. At this time, then, it appears that these learned gentlemen, the judges, and the citizens, thought the court competent to relieve in case the law was judged to be unconstitutional. In 1792, Congress passed an act imposing certain duties respecting invalid pensioners, upon the judges of the circuit court. The judges, at the first court after this act, protested against it; their protests were transmitted to the President of the United States—that President who had presided in the General Convention which framed the Constitution, and, therefore, as likely to understand the powers of Congress on the judiciary as any other man, so far sanctioned their opinions as to transmit them to the next Congress, where the act was reconsidered and repealed. I beg leave, also, to allude to the authority before mentioned, by my friend from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HEMPHILL,) which I should think of some weight here. It is the opinion of a gentleman, venerable for his age, respectable for legal knowledge, and distinguished for what, in the fashionable language of the day, are termed republican principles. I mean the Executive of Pennsylvania; that gentleman, in assigning to the Legislature of his State his reasons for not approving an act they had laid before him, after expressing his doubts of the constitutionality of the act, declares, "he cannot, from a confidence in the legal knowledge, integrity, and fortitude of his former brethren in the Supreme Court, risk his character in a judicial decision on this question, when he does not see any advantage to be derived to his country from a possibility of success." If any words can make more plain the opinion here conveyed, it is that he considers the judges have the power and will exercise it, to declare the act unconstitutional.

To my mind, these considerations are satisfactory, that, from the very constitution of our courts, from the practice and admission of our State courts and State Legislatures, and Federal courts, and Federal Legislature, that the judges of the United States, sitting in court, have the power, and by oath are bound to pronounce, that an act contrary to the Constitution, is void. From the establishment of this proposition, that the judges are the expounders of the Constitution, and the laws made under it, and that they are thereby a check on the Legislature, I shall infer that, by the spirit of our Constitution, they ought to be independent of the other branches of Government, but particularly so of the Legislature. The concentrating the branches of power either Executive and Legislative, or Legislative and Judiciary, in the same hands, is the very essence of tyranny; in proportion as we advance towards the union of those powers, in the same proportion do we recede from liberty. Are these departments separate, unconnected—if the Legislature by any means procure their will either directly or indirectly, to be substituted for or to overrule judicial judgment? Whether the Legislature expound and adjudge their acts themselves, or submit them to the exposition and judgment of a judiciary subservient to them, is essentially the same. If the Legislature exercise the power of removal from office by the direct means of a vote of removal, or by the indirect means, the legislative legerdemain of a repealing act, is precisely the same thing, the judges are no longer independent, but dependent on the Legislature for their offices, and subject to their control; a consequence entirely repugnant to the spirit of our Constitution. I shall attempt to show, that by the words of our Constitution, the judges are placed beyond Legislative control. Article three, section one: "The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office." Until the contemplation of the present measure, I incline to believe, it never entered the mind of any man acquainted with this clause of the Constitution, that judges should be removed otherwise than by impeachment for misdemeanor. The advocates for this Legislative power contend that the tenure of "good behaviour" in this article of the Constitution is intended to restrict Executive and not Legislative power. It does not appear probable that an express restriction should be introduced against a power which is nowhere expressly granted; for gentlemen know that the Executive power of removal from office is a power admitted from construction, and not founded on anything drawn from the Constitution. I say this rather, because, by the Constitution, the aid of the Senate is necessary to appoint, and a fortiori should be necessary to remove. It is important to ascertain what was the intention of the framers of the Constitution in introducing the words "good behaviour." The most correct source in our power from which this aid may be derived, is the writings and opinions at that day of those who aided in the great work. Among those publications which were written for the purpose of explaining and recommending this Constitution, the most celebrated are those pieces over the signature of "Publius," written by the pens of gentlemen of leading influence in the Convention, and whose talents and patriotism are still honored by the nation. In that part of this work which treats of the tenure of the office of judge during "good behaviour," I find this strong expression:

"The standard of good behaviour for the continuance in office of the judicial magistracy, is certainly one of the most valuable of the modern improvements in the practice of Government. In a monarchy, it is an excellent barrier to the despotism of the prince. In a republic, it is a no less excellent barrier to the encroachments and oppressions of the representative body."

This, sir, to my mind, is conclusive, that the Convention intended this tenure as a restriction no less on Legislative than on Executive power, and that, in this sense of the phrase, the people of America received this part of the Constitution. In ascertaining the import of the words "during good behaviour," it is certainly important to inquire the end to which they have been used in other similar cases. My colleague (Mr. HENDERSON) has, with much abler talents, shown that, in most of the State constitutions, which existed before our Federal Constitution, these words are used to fix the tenure of offices where the Executive have neither express nor constructive power of removal; consequently, they are in those constitutions restrictive of the Legislative power. If, then, the framers of our Constitution borrowed this tenure from these State constitutions, it is fair and reasonable to conclude they used them in the sense in which they were previously received. But, says my colleague on the other side of the House, (Mr. ROBERT WILLIAMS,) the judges in England hold their offices by the tenure of "good behaviour," and yet are removable on an address from both Houses of Parliament, and he infers that the terms may have been taken from England. To this I will first observe, that no fair argument can be drawn from the existence of this Legislative power there, for the exercise here. The mode of appointment there may render such control over the Executive necessary, which, from the provisions of our Constitution, are not wanted here. In England, the King has the sole power of appointment—the people have no previous check. In this country, the Executive appointment is checked by the requisite sanction of the Senate. But is this Legislative power in Great Britain usurped by construction? No, if the gentleman will read again the statute of 13 William III., he will find that this power of removal is expressly granted by the Crown to Parliament. If, then, one convention had this statute before them, in adopting that part which relates to the tenure of office, and omitting that part which gives the power of removal, it is not to be presumed they intended so important a power should depend on construction. The same gentleman (Mr. ROBERT WILLIAMS) also contended that it could not be presumed the Convention intended to restrict the power of the Representatives of the people, the friends of the people. What will the gentleman say of the correctness of his opinion, when I remind him that our powers are all expressly restricted; that the same article which fixes the tenure of "good behaviour," expressly and undoubtedly guards against the power of the Representatives of the people, the friends of the people, by securing the salaries of the judges undiminished during their continuance in office.

But, as strong an argument as can be used against this constructive Legislative power, is the evils which may result from the exercise of it. Popular assemblies are as much under the dominance of passion as individuals; they feel as sensibly and resent as malignantly. He who has not made this observation is a stranger to what has passed in all popular governments; and I am sorry to add, a stranger to what has so lately passed in this country. By the exercise of this power, firm, upright judges, men of unbending virtue, are to be removed upon every change of administration, to make way for more pliant minions, the humble instruments of the Legislature. The bulwark of our liberties against Legislative encroachment, the independence and purity of our Judiciary, is tumbled into ruins, and the rights of millions are crushed by its fall. The sacred altar of justice is polluted, the sword of justice becomes the rod of oppression. On the other hand, what danger is to be apprehended from that independence of the judges for which the friends of the Constitution contend? Not that bad and corrupt men will be fastened on us. No, the Constitution provides for their removal by impeachment. Not that they will viciously oppose the Constitutional acts of the Legislature. No, the Legislature are a check upon them by the mode of impeachment, in which the House is the accuser and the Senate the judge. If the judge be corrupt, if he misdeemean himself, he may be removed. If he continue pure and upright, he ought not to be removed; no earthly power, but the mighty hand of the people, which formed the Constitution and can destroy it, can legally remove him. Should this measure be adopted, and the independence of our Judiciary destroyed; should the administration of our Government unfortunately pass into the hands of men who feel power and forget right, our Constitution becomes indeed "a Lilliputian tie;" and this measure will be the first link in that chain of measures which will add the name of America to the melancholy catalogue of fallen Republics.

Mr. GILES said that he felt some degree of apprehension, that, in the course he deemed it necessary to take in the discussion of this question, some observations might fall from him which might not be in strict harmony with the feelings of some gentlemen of the committee. He should regret, however, if a compliance with a sense of duty should produce that effect. He said, therefore, that he wished to apprise gentlemen, that he intended to direct his observations as much as possible to the effects and tendencies of measures; and that when he was constrained to speak of the views of gentlemen, it would be with respect to what he conceived to be their opinions in relation to the general interests, and not to private gratifications. He said it was natural that men should differ in the choice of means to produce a given end, and more natural that they should differ in the choice of political means than any other; because the subject presented more complicated and variable objects, out of which to make a choice. Accordingly, a great portion of the human mind has been at all times directed towards monarchy, as the best form of government to enforce obedience and insure the general happiness; whereas another portion of the human mind has given a preference to the republican form, as best calculated to produce the same end; and there is no reason for applying improper motives to individuals who should give a preference to either of the principles, provided in doing so they follow the honest dictates of their own judgments. It must be obvious to the most common observer, that, from the commencement of the Government of the United States, and perhaps before it, a difference of opinion existed among the citizens, having more or less reference to these two extreme fundamental points, and that it manifested itself in the modification or administration of the Government as soon as it was put in operation. On one side, it was contended, that in the organization of the Constitution a due apportionment of authority had not been made among the several departments; that the Legislature was too powerful for the Executive department; and to create and preserve a proper equipoise, it was necessary to infuse into the Executive department, by legislation, all artificial powers compatible with the Constitution, upon which the most diffusive construction was given; or, in other words, to place in Executive hands all the patronage it was possible to create, for the purpose of protecting the President against the full force of his Constitutional responsibility to the people. On the other side, it was contended, that the doctrine of patronage was repugnant to the opinions and feelings of the people; that it was unnecessary, expensive, and oppressive, and that the highest energy the Government could possess, would flow from the confidence of the mass of the people, founded upon their own sense of their common interests. Hence, what is called party in the United States, grew up from a division of opinion respecting these two great characteristic principles. Patronage, or the creation of partial interest for the protection and support of Government, on the one side: On the other side, to effect the same end, a fair responsibility of all representatives to the people; an adherence to the general interests, and a reliance on the confidence of the people at large, resulting from a sense of their common interests. A variety of circumstances existed in the United States, at the commencement of the Government, and a great number of favorable incidents continued afterwards to arise, which gave the patronage system the preponderancy, during the first three Presidential terms, of election; notwithstanding it was evident, that the system was adopted and pursued in direct hostility to the feelings and opinions of a great portion of the American people. The Government was ushered into operation under a vast excitement of federal fervor, flowing from its recent triumph on the question of adopting the Constitution. At that time a considerable debt was afloat in the United States, which had grown out of the Revolutionary war. This debt was of two kinds: the debt proper of the United States, or engagements made by the United States in their federal capacity; the other, the State debts, or engagements entered into by the respective States for the support of the common cause.

The favorers of the patronage system readily availed themselves of these materials for erecting a moneyed interest; gave to it a stability, or qualified perpetuity, and calculated upon its certain support in all their measures of irresponsibility.

This was done not only by funding the debt proper of the United States, but by assuming the payment of the State debts, and funding them also; and it is believed, extending the assumption beyond the actual engagements of the States. Hence the Federal axiom, that a public debt is a public blessing. Shortly after this event, an Indian war sprang up—he would not say by what means—in consequence of which an army was added to the list of patronage. The Algerines commenced a predatory war upon the commerce of the United States, and thence a navy formed a new item of patronage. Taxes became necessary to meet the expenses of this system, and an arrangement of internal taxes, an excise, &c., still swelled the list of patronage. But the circumstance which most favored this system was, the breaking out of a tremendous and unprecedented war in those countries of Europe with which the United States had the most intimate relations. The feelings and sympathies of the people of the United States were so strongly attracted by the tremendous scenes existing there, that they considered their own internal concerns in a secondary point of view. After a variable conduct had been pursued by the United States in relation to these events, the depredations committed upon commerce, and the excitements produced thereby, enabled the Administration to indulge themselves in a more decisive course, and they at once pushed forward the people to the X, Y, Z, of their political alphabet, before they had well learned and understood the A, B, C, of the principles of the Administration.

Armies and navies were raised, and a variety of other schemes of expense were adopted, which placed the Administration in the embarrassing predicament, either to violate their faith with their public creditors, or to resort to new taxes. The latter alternative was preferred, accompanied with other strong coercive measures to enforce obedience. A land tax was laid for two millions of dollars. This measure awakened the people to a sense of their situation; and shook to the foundation all those federal ramparts which had been planned with so much ingenuity, and erected around the Executive with so much expense and labor. Another circumstance peculiarly favorable to the advocates of Executive patronage was, that during the two first Presidential terms, the Chief Executive Magistrate possessed a greater degree of popularity and the confidence of the people than ever was, or perhaps will ever be again attached to the person occupying that dignified station. The general disquietude which manifested itself in consequence of these enterprising measures, in the year 1800, induced the Federal party to apprehend that they had pushed their principles too far, and they began to entertain doubts of the result of the Presidential election, which was approaching. In this state of things, it was natural for them to look out for some department of the Government in which they could entrench themselves in the event of an unsuccessful issue in the election, and continue to support those favorite principles of irresponsibility which they could never consent to abandon.

The Judiciary department, of course, presented itself as best fitted for their object, not only because it was already filled with men who had manifested the most indecorous zeal in favor of their principles, but because they held their offices by indefinite tenures, and of course were further removed from any responsibility to the people, than either of the other departments. Accordingly, on the 11th of March 1800, a bill for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States, was presented to the House of Representatives. This bill appears to have had for its objects, First, the gradual demolition of the State courts, by increasing the number and extending the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. Second, to afford additional protection to the principles of the then existing Administration by creating a new corps of judges of concurring political opinions. This bill, however, was not passed into a law during that session of Congress, perhaps from an apprehension that it would tend to increase the disquietudes which other measures had before excited, and therefore operate unfavorably to the approaching Presidential election. At the next session, after the result of the late election was ascertained, the bill, after having undergone some considerable alterations, was passed into the law now under discussion. This law, it is now said, is inviolable and irrevocable. It is said, the independence of the judge will be thereby immolated. Yes, sir, this law is now considered as the sanctuary of the principles of the last Administration, and the tenures of the judges as the horns of inviolability within that sanctuary. He said, we are now called upon to rally round the Constitution as the ark of our political safety. Gentlemen, discarding all generalising expressions, and the spirit of the instrument, tie down all construction to the strict letter of the Constitution. He said, it gave him great pleasure to meet gentlemen on this ground; and the more so, because he had long been in the habit of hearing very different language from the same gentlemen. He had long been in the habit of hearing the same gentlemen speak of the expressions of "the common defence and the general welfare," as the only valuable part of the Constitution; that they were sufficient to obliterate all specifications and limitations of power. That the Constitution was a mere nose of wax, yielding to every impression it received. That every "opening wedge" which was driven into it, was highly beneficial in severing asunder the limitations and restrictions of power. That the republicanism it secured, meant anything or nothing. It gave him therefore, great pleasure at this time to obey the injunctions of gentlemen in rallying round the Constitution as the ark of our political safety, and of interpreting it in by the plain and obvious meaning and letter of the specified powers. But, he said, as if it was always the unfortunate destiny of these gentlemen to be upon extremes, they have now got round to the opposite extreme point of the political compass, and even beyond it. For, he said, they not only tie down all construction to the letter of the instrument, but they tell us that they see, and call upon us also to see written therein, in large capital characters, "the independence of judges;" which, to the extent they carry the meaning of the term, is neither to be found in the letter or spirit of that instrument, or in any other political establishment, he believed, under the sun. Mr. G. said he rejoiced that this subject was now to be discussed; he thought the crisis peculiarly auspicious for the discussion. He said the European world, with which the United States have the most relations, is now tranquilized. The tremendous scenes of blood and revolution which had agitated that portion of the globe, had at length subsided into profound peace; and had left mankind in silent amazement, to retrospect the wonderful events which were passed; and he hoped, with calm deliberation, to improve the lessons they had furnished for the benefit of mankind in time to come. The interests and sympathies, which the people of the United States felt in these events, no longer turn their attention from their internal concerns; arguments of the highest consideration for the safety of the Constitution and the liberty of the citizens, no longer receive the short reply, French partisans! Jacobins! Disorganizers! And although the gentleman from North Carolina sees, or thinks he sees, the destructive spirit mount in the whirlwind and direct the storm, let him be consoled by the information, "that all these, our actors, are mere spirits, and are dissolved into thin air." Yes, sir, these magical delusions are now vanished, and have left the American people and their Congress, in their real persons, and original American characters, engaged in the transaction of American concerns.

Upon taking a view of our internal situation, he observed, although party rage may not be done away, it may be said, its highest paroxysm is past. And although the gentleman from New York, (Mr. T. MORRIS) yesterday observed that the President had commenced a system of persecution, so ignorant, he said, he was of the existence of a such system, that he could not conceive to what the gentleman alluded. It is sometime, Mr. Chairman, since a member of this House, and sundry printers throughout the United States, have been amerced and imprisoned to appease the vengeance of an unconstitutional sedition act, merely for publishing their own sentiments, which happened to be unpalatable to the then existing Administration! It is sometime, sir, since we have seen judges, who ought to have been independent, converted into political partisans, and like Executive missionaries, pronouncing political harangues throughout the United States! It is sometime, sir, since we have seen the zealous judge stoop from the bench to look out for more victims for judicial vengeance! It is sometime since we have seen the same judicial impetuosity drive from the bar the most respectable counsel, who humanely proposed to interpose between a friendless and unprotected man and the judicial vengeance to which he was doomed! It is sometime, sir, since we have seen the same judicial zeal extending the provisions of the sedition act, by discovering that it had jurisdiction of the lex non scripta, or common law! It is sometime since we have seen the Chief Executive Magistrate dooming to humiliation "in dust and ashes" a great portion of the American people! Yes sir, these terrific scenes are past. These noisy declamations, and this judicial zeal, are hushed into silence by the audible pronouncement of the public will. He said, we may even indulge the hope, Mr. Chairman, that our pulpits will not much longer be converted into political forums; and that the meek and humble teachers of the Christian faith, instead of stirring up all the angry and destructive passions of the human mind, will ere long once more condescend to teach those lessons of humility, forbearance, and toleration, taught them by their Divine Preceptor. Those precepts so essential to the discovery of truth, by predisposing the mind to deliberation and reflection.

The present Executive, pursuing the general good, and supported by the general confidence, stands not in need of these artificial aids. He invites inquiry. He knows that the highest encomium which can be bestowed upon his administration would flow from a correct understanding of his motives and his conduct. Instead of calling in the aid of sedition acts to the defamatory scribblers, who appear to increase in numbers and in impudence in proportion to the desperation of their cause and their security from punishment, he has said, "Let them stand undisturbed, as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated, where reason is left free to combat it." Under these auspicious circumstances, he said, he proceeded to the discussion of the important question before us with pleasure, conscious that he was subject to error, and knowing that if he did err, it was his interest to be corrected; confident, also, that there was a mass of intelligence and calm reflection at this time in the people of the United States, competent to detect the error and apply the corrective. Impressed with these sentiments, he differed widely in opinion with the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. HENDERSON,) who had said, that "If the bill upon your table should pass into a law, he would not heave a sigh or drop a tear upon the instantaneous demolition of the whole Constitution. The sooner it was done the better." Sir, this gentleman and his associates in political opinions have termed themselves "lovers of order." Is this an evidence of the practice we are to expect from those gentlemen, under their professions so long and so loudly made to the people of the United States? Cannot that gentleman find some reason to regret that sentiment in the confidence due to the intelligence and patriotism of a great portion of his fellow-citizens who differ with him on that point? Or do the gentleman and his political associates claim, with presumptuous vanity, not only the appellation of the exclusive "lovers of order," but also the monopoly of all the intelligence and patriotism of the nation? He had too much respect for gentlemen to suppose they would place their pretensions on this ground. He begged pardon of the Committee for this digression; he had been impelled to it from the course the debate had taken, and particularly from the indecorous attacks made on the President of the United States.

He said he would now proceed to examine whether the repeal of the Judiciary law of the last session of Congress would in any respect violate that salutary and practicable independence of the judges which was secured to them by the Constitution. He said the term independence of Judges or of the Judiciary department was not to be found in the Constitution. It was therefore a mere inference from some of the specified powers. And he believed in the meaning of gentlemen, and to the extent they carry it, that the term is not to be found either in the spirit, general character, or phraseology, of any article or section of the Constitution. He meant to give the Constitution the most candid interpretation in his power, according to the plain and obvious import of the English language. He should discard, in his interpretation, the terms "common defence and general welfare," which had been resorted to by some gentlemen. He considered these words as containing no grant of power whatever, but merely the expression of the ends or objects to be effected by the grants of specified powers. He therefore protested against drawing any aid whatever from them in his construction of the instrument. He said he had read through the whole Constitution, to enable him to form his opinion upon this question, for fear there might be in some hidden corner of it some provision which might demonstrate the unconstitutionality of the present bill; and if so, (although he should lament such a provision,) he would instantly give up the bill. But his researches had terminated in a different result. He said he found, from the general character of the Constitution, that the general will was its basis, the general good its object, and the fundamental principle for effecting this object was the responsibility of all public agents, either mediately or immediately to the people. He said the context of the Constitution would demonstrate the two first points, which he begged to read:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

Here we find the Constitution founded upon the will of the people, and the object declared to be the good of the people. Through the whole body of the Constitution may be discerned the responsibility of all public agents, either mediately or immediately, to the people. This responsibility results, first, from the division of authority into different departments; secondly, from a specification and limitation of the authorities of all and each of the departments; thirdly, from periodical appointments of the public agents. The first clause declares there shall be a Congress, to whom the business of legislation is confided. This Congress is to consist of a House of Representatives, to be chosen by the people immediately, and responsible to them at the end of every two years; and a Senate, to be chosen by the Legislatures of the different States, who are chosen by the people—one-third of the Senators to be chosen every two years, and responsible at the end of every six years. The Executive power is vested in a President, who is chosen by Electors, who are chosen for the express purpose by the people, and responsible at the end of every four years. The President may be considered as immediately responsible to the people, although chosen through the medium of Electors; because it is found, in practice, that the Electors are constrained to avow the vote they intend to give before they are chosen, and the people have generally made their elections with a view to that object.

Thus, then, are formed two departments, their powers specified and defined, the times for extending their powers fixed, and indeed a complete organization for the execution of their respective powers, without the intervention of any law for that purpose. A third department, to wit: the Judiciary department, is still wanting. Is that formed by the Constitution? How is that to be formed? It is not formed by the Constitution. It is only declared that there shall be such a department; and it is directed to be formed by the other two departments, who owe a responsibility to the people. Here there arises an important difference of opinion between the different sides of this House. It is contended on one side that the Judiciary department is formed by the Constitution itself. It is contended on the other side, that the Constitution does no more than to declare that there shall be a Judiciary department, and directs that it shall be formed by the other two departments, under certain modifications. Article third, section first, the Constitution has these words: "The Judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress shall from time to time ordain and establish." Here, then, the power to ordain and establish inferior courts is given to Congress in the most unqualified terms, and also to ordain and establish "one Supreme Court." The only limitation upon the power of Congress in this clause, consists in the number of supreme courts to be established; the limitation is to the number of one, although that is an affirmative and not a negative expression. The number of judges, the assignment of duties, the fixing compensations, the fixing the times when, and places where, the courts shall exercise their functions, &c., are left to the entire discretion of Congress. The spirit, as well as the words of the Constitution, are completely satisfied, provided one Supreme Court be established. Hence, when all these essential points in the organization and formation of courts is intrusted to the unlimited discretion of Congress, it cannot be said that the courts are formed by the Constitution. For further restraints, therefore, upon the discretion of Congress, the remaining part of the same section must be consulted. Here he begged leave to remark, that he had often felt a veneration for the wisdom of the sages who formed this Constitution; considering the difficulties they had to encounter, resulting from the various local prejudices and local interests of the different parts of the United States, and the vast variety of opinions which the subject presented, it was almost wonderful to conceive how they should have hit upon a system so admirably calculated to protect and to promote the general interests, when administered according to its original meaning and intention. He could not go so far as to say it was perfect. He admitted, like other human productions, it was stamped with the common fallibility of man. That he wished, however, to see no radical changes in its principles. He wished to hand it down to posterity with those amendments only which experience should suggest, and which would grow out of the continually varying state of the nation. He said it was not only remarkable for the wisdom of its arrangements, but the correct and technical mode of expression. The part of the section now to be examined, was an example of the justice of both these remarks. The words are, "the judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

The first part of the sentence respects the relationship between the Executive and the Judiciary departments. It respects judges or officers of the courts who are appointed by the President. The last part of the sentence respects the relationship between the Legislative and Judiciary departments. It respects the creation of offices, the fixing the compensation of the officers or judges, and their continuance in office. These are the peculiar attributes of the Legislative department. Accordingly, the most correct and technical words are used in relation to both these objects. The term "hold their offices during good behaviour," relates merely to the Executive department. The term "hold," is the common technical word used to convey the idea of tenure. Tenure requires two parties. The one granting, the other holding or receiving the grant. Let the inquiry be made, of whom do the judges hold? The Constitution furnishes the answer, of the President. One of the most obvious rules in the construction of instruments of writing is, that the whole of it must be taken together, and not one particular part by itself. The following words will be found in the second section of the second article of the Constitution: "And he (to wit, the President) shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law." In the third section of the same article, are these words: "And shall (to wit, the President) commission all the officers of the United States." These three sentences contain the relationship between the Executive and Judiciary departments, so far as respects the objects of the present discussion.

To ascertain the real meaning and import of these sentences, they should be read in connexion with each other, excluding therefrom all intermediate words not immediately bearing on the subject. In that case the Constitution would read thus: "He (to wit, the President) shall nominate and appoint the judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, and shall commission all the officers of the United States. The judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour." It may now be asked, if this case of the judges of the supreme and inferior courts be not an obvious exception out of the general Presidential discretion of appointing and commissioning all officers of the United States during pleasure? After the Government has been in operation above twelve years, and the principle of commissioning all Executive officers during pleasure, has been practised upon during the whole of the period by the Executive, as well as the Legislative department, the propriety of that practice is for the first time now become questionable. It is said that the right to commission during pleasure, is by implication. It is readily admitted that there are no express words in the Constitution to that effect; but the inference from the words which are there, is almost as strong as the words themselves, if they had been inserted. The President is authorized, without limitation, to "commission all the officers of the United States." The question arises, by what tenure? The reply is, according to his pleasure or discretion. It was not difficult to foresee, that if the President was fully empowered to commission as he pleased, he would please to commission during his pleasure. The Legislature has no more control over an officer who holds an Executive commission during the pleasure of the President, than over a Judicial officer holding his office during good behaviour. The remedy given by the Constitution being the same in both cases, to wit: impeachment. Nor is there any reason why the office of the one should be less subject to the discretion of the Legislature, than the office of the other; and it seems to be universally agreed, that although the Legislature cannot deprive an Executive officer of his office in any other way than by impeachment, during the continuance of such office, yet the office itself is always subject to be abolished. The same reasoning will hold with equal force respecting a judge and a Judicial office. The reason why the Executive is proscribed from the removal of a judge, is to secure to the judge a complete independence of the President, who is not responsible for the discharge of Judicial duties; but the removal is perfectly correct in the case of an Executive officer, because the President is highly responsible for the due discharge of Executive duties. The Legislature is not responsible for either, and of course stands in the same Constitutional relation to both. This appears obvious from furnishing to the Legislature the same means of removing both, as will appear by the fourth section of the second article, in the following words: "The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office by impeachment for, and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes or misdemeanors." He now begged to call the attention of the Committee particularly to the last clause of the sentence, which ascertains the Constitutional connexion between the Legislative and Judicial departments, so far as respects the limitation of the Legislative, in the exercise of the power committed to it, for the organization of the Judicial department. He should place particular emphasis on these words of the Constitution in the exposition he proposed to make. The words are: "And shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office." The first part of this section having given to Congress the power of creating courts, ascertaining the number of judges, &c., these last words may be considered as containing explanations and limitations of the general power of Congress, as was the foregoing part of this sentence a limitation of the general Executive power. And accordingly the most correct terms are used for limiting Legislative discretion, and explaining its objects; according to the words of this sentence, the judge is to receive a compensation for his services. To whom are these services to be rendered? To the people, for the benefit of the people. Who is to judge of the necessity or utility of these services? The Constitution has ordained, that Congress, or in other words, the Representatives of the people, shall be the tribunal. Suppose there should be no services required, none for the judge to perform, and that Congress should so think and determine: Is the judge entitled to compensation? He is not. The condition of service for the benefit of the people, is the express consideration upon which the compensation accrues. No service is rendered, the competent tribunal says, there is none required, of course no compensation accrues. The judge is entitled to receive none. On this point, an obvious and most important difference of opinion exists between the two sides of the Committee. On one side it is contended, that the office is the vested property of the judge, conferred on him by his appointment, and that his good behaviour is the consideration of his compensation; so long, therefore, as his good behaviour exists, so long his office must continue in consequence of his good behaviour, and that his compensation is his property in virtue of his office, and therefore cannot be taken away by any authority whatever, although there may be no service for him to perform. On the other side, it is contended that the good behaviour is not the consideration upon which the compensation accrues, but services rendered for the public good; and that if the office is to be considered as a property, it is a property held in trust for the benefit of the people, and must therefore be held subject to that condition, of which Congress is the Constitutional judge. Mr. G. said, considering the boundary line between these conflicting opinions to be the boundary line between the offices held for public utility, and offices held for personal favor, he could not bestow too much attention upon this part of the discussion; for if the construction gentlemen contend for should prevail, in vain have the framers of the Constitution, with so much jealous circumspection, erected so many ramparts against the introduction of some of these offices in the Government of the United States. A sinecure office is an office held without the condition of service; often for past services already compensated; often for present favor, without the condition of any service. For the purpose of excluding from the Federal Government all sinecure offices, the sages who formed the Constitution have through every part of it connected services and compensation, and they ought never to be separated in construction. The sixth section of the first article is in these words: "The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law," &c., and so far has this principle of the rendition of service been carried, that the service of the Senate and Representatives is to be rendered every day, and unless they do daily render service, they are not entitled to their day's compensation. In the first section of the second article of the Constitution, are these words: "The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation," &c. In the forty-first section of the act under which the judges claim their compensation, are these words: "That each of the circuit judges of the United States, to be appointed by virtue of this act, shall be allowed as a compensation for his services," &c. These expressions all demonstrate the importance of coupling the service and compensation of office. But the jealous caution of the framers of the Constitution did not stop at choosing the best affirmative expression for excluding this doctrine of sinecure offices, they also applied negative restraints.

In the ninth section of the first article of the Constitution, are these words, "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." In the same section, "No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States, and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them, shall, without the consent of Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State." If then services rendered for the public benefit, be the essential consideration, upon which the compensation does accrue to the judges; if the Congress be the proper tribunal for pronouncing upon the necessity or utility of such service, and if they decide that no such service is necessary or useful; the judge sustains no injury in not receiving the compensation, because he does not comply with the condition on his part; nor does he sustain a hardship thereby, because it must be presumed that he understood the second conditions attached to his office at the time of his acceptance. It has been admitted by all gentlemen, that Congress is the Constitutional tribunal for deciding respecting the services to be performed. They admit that Congress may modify the courts, diminish or add to their duties, alter the terms of their sessions, or make any other arrangements respecting them which do not go to take away or diminish their compensations. It is to be observed that there is not one of these powers specified in the Constitution; they are therefore necessary inferences from the paramount power "to ordain and establish," and the power of repeal, or to take away all the services to be performed, is as necessary an inference as either of the others, and has uniformly resulted from every other specified power in the Constitution. From this part of the sentence, therefore, it is deducible, that the only restraint upon the general power given to Congress in the first part of the section to ordain and establish courts, is, that the compensations of the judges should not be lessened during their continuance in office; not during their good behaviour. And in this part of the sentence the correct phraseology of the Constitution is worthy of observation. In speaking of the Executive attribute, to wit, the appointing and commissioning officers, the term good behaviour is used. In speaking of the Legislative attribute, to wit, the creation of the offices and fixing compensations, the term during their continuance in office is used. The reason for this variation of expression is obvious. It was known that the office might be discontinued, and the judge continue to behave well; the limitation was therefore applied to the office, and not the good behaviour, because if the office should be discontinued, which is clearly implied in this expression, it was not the intention of the Constitution that the compensation should be received, no service in that event being to be rendered. From this interpretation of the Constitution, all of the departments are preserved in the due exercise of their respective functions for the general good, without any of the mischievous and absurd consequences resulting from the opposite construction. It is admitted that the first part of this section expressly vests Congress with the general power to ordain and establish courts; and, if there had been no other restriction, the consequent power to unordain, or abolish. The restriction relied upon is not a restriction in express words: there are no words in the Constitution prohibiting Congress from repealing a law for organizing courts; the restraint contended for, therefore, is by implication, and that implication, to say the least, not expressly connected with any Legislative attribute. Is it right, is it a correct interpretation, that when a power is given in express words for the most important purposes, that it should be restrained or prohibited by implication? Can so much inattention and folly be attributed to the framers of the Constitution, as would result from the supposition that if it was their intention that a law growing out of one of the specified powers, in contradistinction to all others, should be irrevocable when once passed, that so extraordinary a principle would be left to mere implication? Such a supposition would be the highest injustice to the superior intelligence and patriotism of those gentlemen, manifested in every other part of the instrument. No, sir, they would have made notes of admiration: they would have used every mark, adopted every caution, to have arrested and fixed the attention of the Legislature to so extraordinary a principle.

They would have said, Legislators! be circumspect! Be cautious! Be calm! Be deliberate! Be wise! Be wise not only for the present, but be wise for posterity! You are now about to tread upon holy ground. The law you are now about to pass, is irrevocable! Irrevocable! We are so enamoured with the salutary and practical independence of the English Judiciary system, that in infusing its principle into our Constitution, we have stamped it with the proverbial folly of the Medes and Persians! If this principle had been introduced into the Constitution in express words, it would have formed an unfortunate contrast to all other parts of the instrument; yet gentlemen make no difficulty in introducing that principle by construction, which would have appeared so stupid and absurd if written in express words in the body of the instrument. But there is no such language in the Constitution. Let us see what is the language of that instrument. "The Judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Here, then, instead of cautioning the Legislature that a law for the organization of courts, when passed, can never be repealed, it contains an invitation to a revision from time to time. It contains an intimation, that the subject is new and difficult, and an injunction to ordain and establish your courts from time to time, according to the results, which an experience of the system alone could suggest. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HEMPHILL,) observed that the character of irrevocability was not exclusively attached to this law, and attempted to furnish instances of other laws of the same character. He instanced a law for the admission of a new State into the Union.

The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. DAVIS,) had given a proper reply to that remark; the strongest instance the gentleman gave, was of a law executed. After the new State is admitted into the Union, in virtue of a law for that purpose, the object of the law is answered. The State admitted has no stipulated duties to perform on its part, no services to render; in the case before the Committee the law is in a state of execution, and the judges have services to render on their part which the competent tribunals may determine to be neither useful nor necessary. A law for the appropriation of money to a given object, may be adduced as an instance; the money is applied; its object is answered; the law may be said to be irrevocable, or, in other words, the repeal would produce no effect. That is not the case of the law in question. Mr. G. said he had no doubt but that the framers of the Constitution had particular reference to the British act of Parliament of William the III. for the establishment of the independence of the judges in that country, in framing the section for the establishment of the Judicial department in the United States; and it is not a little remarkable, that whilst gentlemen in one breath speak of the independence of the English judges, as the boast and glory of that nation, in the next breath they tell us that by the repeal of the present act, the independence of the judges here would be immolated. Let this subject be examined. In the third chapter of the first book of Blackstone's Commentaries, the independence of the English Judiciary is fully explained. He begged to read the exposition of that commentator on that subject.

"And, in order to maintain both the dignity and independence of the judges of the superior courts, it is enacted by the statute, 13 W. III. c. 2, that their commissions shall be made (not, as formerly, durante bene placito, but) quam diu bene se gesserint, and their salaries ascertained and established; but that it may be lawful to remove them on the address of both Houses of Parliament. And now, by the noble improvements of that law in the statute of Geo. III. c. 23, enacted at the earnest recommendation of the King himself, from the Throne, the judges are continued in their offices during their good behaviour, notwithstanding any demise of the Crown, (which was formerly held immediately to vacate their seats,) and their full salaries are absolutely secured to them during the continuance of their commissions. His Majesty having been pleased to declare, that "he looked upon the independence and uprightness of the judges, as essential to the impartial administration of justice; as one of the best securities of the rights and liberties of his subjects; and as the most conducive to the honor of the Crown."

Now, sir, under the doctrine contended for by the repeal of this law, let us see whether the judges of the United States are not more independent than the judges of England. In the first place, Congress have the power of originating, abolishing, modifying, &c., the courts here. The Parliament in England have the same power there. Congress cannot remove a Judicial officer from his office so long as the office itself is deemed useful, except by impeachment, two thirds of the Senate being necessary to a conviction. In England, judges can be removed from their offices, although the offices may be deemed useful, by an address of a majority of the two Houses of Parliament. Here then is one essential advantage in favor of the independence of the judges of the United States. Congress cannot diminish the compensation of the judges here during their continuance in office. In England, the Parliament may diminish the compensation of the judges at their discretion, during their continuance in office. Here then, is another obvious advantage in favor of the independence of the judges of the United States; whence is it, then, that we hear of the independence of the English Judiciary, as being the boast and glory of that country, and with justice too, and at the same time hear the cry of the immolation of the independence of the judges of the United States, when, under the interpretation of the Constitution by the favorers of the repeal, the judges here are more independent than the English judges? It can have no other object than to excite a popular clamor, which, if excited at all, can have only a momentary effect, and will be dissipated as soon as the subject shall be thoroughly examined and understood. But it appeared to him, that if gentlemen really do value the independence of the judges, they have taken an unfortunate ground in the interpretation of the Constitution. Under their construction the judges may be placed not only in a dependent, but a ludicrous point of view.

Gentlemen admit that Congress may constitutionally increase or diminish the duties of judges; give or take away jurisdiction; fix the times of holding courts, &c., saving therefrom the salaries of the judges. Under this admission, Congress may postpone the sessions of the courts for eight or ten years, and establish others, to whom they could transfer all the powers of the existing courts. In this case, the judges would be held up to the people as pensioners, receiving their money and rendering no service in return; or Congress might convert them into mere courts of piepoudre, assigning them the most paltry duties to perform, and keep them continually in session, in inconvenient places; whilst new courts could be erected to perform all the essential business of the nation. This would be taking down the high pretensions assigned to the judges by the gentleman from North Carolina. (Mr. HENDERSON,) of being formed into a permanent corps for the purpose of protecting the people against their worst enemies, themselves; and degrading them into pitiful courts of piepoudre, rendering little service and receiving large compensations. And this would be the case, if party purposes were the object, and not the general good. According to his construction, these absurd results could not take place, unless by a virtual breach of the Constitution. Because, he contended, that service and compensation were correlative terms; and that there ought always to be a due apportionment of service to compensation. This he considered as the plain and sound interpretation of the Constitution, and the moment it is departed from, infinite absurdities ensue. He intended to have taken another view of this subject, as it respects the relative influence of the law of the last session, and the proposed repeal upon this question; but the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) has put this subject in so much stronger point of view than he could do, that he would refer to his remarks thereupon, observing only that he had no doubt but that the law of last session, now proposed to be repealed, was in every respect as much opposed to the doctrine of gentlemen, as the contemplated repeal could be. The sections of the law particularly alluded to, are the twenty-fourth, in these words, "and be it further enacted, that the district courts of the United States, in and for the districts of Tennessee and Kentucky, shall be and are hereby abolished," and the twenty-seventh, in these words, "and be it further enacted, that the circuit courts of the United States, heretofore established, shall cease and be abolished."

He said he would now examine some of the consequences of the doctrine against the repeal, and see if it can be recommended from that consideration. First, as it respects the Judicial department. Its first effect is to produce a perpetual increase of judges and salaries, without any practicable mode of reducing them. This is inconsistent both with the general sentiment of the people and the Constitution, that requires that no compensation shall be received, without an equivalent service rendered.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania supposes that there would be as much danger that a corrupt legislature would give an enormous sum, say two hundred thousand dollars, to one judge, as to increase too great a number of judges. Yet he says the Legislature is restrained in express words from lessening the salary, and infers from that circumstance that it is also restrained from lessening the number of officers. Mr. G. made from it the direct contrary inference. If there be neither the power to lessen the sum nor abolish the office, there is no remedy for the evil the gentleman suggests. It is an incurable mischief. There is, therefore, a necessity for a power to abolish the office, as a remedy against the enormous abuse of giving so large a sum without the rendition of equivalent service. And as express words were deemed necessary to limit the discretion of Congress against diminishing the sum, so would there have been greater necessity for express words to limit the discretion of Congress against the abolition of unnecessary offices.

Mr. G. said, that according to a sound rule of interpretation, where a general grant of power is made, and one limitation to the general power is expressed, the expression of that limitation is an exclusion of all intention to make any other limitation whatever, by inference or implication. And this rule will apply to all other cases put by gentlemen, where there is an express limitation of Legislative authority. But the most important consequence from this doctrine is, that it erects the judges into a body politic and corporate, in perpetual succession, with censorial and controlling powers over the other departments. And for what purpose? The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. HENDERSON) has informed us, "to protect the people against their worst enemies," themselves! This is the real exposition of the object in very few but emphatical words. As the inducement to the adoption of this principle, gentlemen have reminded us of the fate of a foreign country, of the violent passions which agitate popular assemblies, of the age, experience, the unassuming talents and unambitious virtue of judges. He said the judges were selected from their fellow-citizens, and he presumed possessed the same human propensities. He said all men love power, and in general, those love it best who know best how to use it. Let us apply this remark to the judges of the United States.

Very shortly after the establishment of the courts, the judges decided that they had jurisdiction over the States in their sovereign capacity. Did this, in the judges, seem unambitious? The States thought it did not. It happened that during the Revolutionary war, the State of Massachusetts had issued certain obligatory bills, which were made transferable, and which were outstanding without any provision for their payment; suits were instituted on these bills. The court determined to bring the great State of Massachusetts, and not Virginia, on its knees, not at the feet of justice, but policy. Upon the representation of Massachusetts, an amendment was made to the Constitution of the United States, declaring that the Constitution should not be construed to extend to authorizing the courts to arraign and pronounce judgment against States which had not consented to give up their sovereignty. Thus this unambitious project of the judges was prostrated by a Constitutional interposition. He read the amendment, in the following words: "The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to 'any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State.'" The judges have determined that they are judges in the last resort upon the constitutionality of your laws. He proposed not to discuss this question, because he did not think it pertinent to the question before us. He only mentioned it to show their unlimited claims to power. The judges have determined that their jurisdiction extends to the lex non scripta, or rather to the lex non descripta, or common law. Does this, in the judges, seem unambitious? This law pervades the whole municipal regulations of the country. It is unlimited in its object, and indefinite in its character. Legalize this unassuming claim of jurisdiction by the judges, and they have before them every object of legislation. They have sent a mandatory process, or process leading to a mandamus, into the Executive cabinet, to examine its concerns. Does this, in the judges, seem unambitious? Now, sir, examine and combine the extraordinary pretensions to power, legalize them, and you have precisely that body politic and corporate which gentlemen deem so important in the United States "to protect the people from their worst enemies—themselves!" He should not resort so frequently to this expression, but that he did consider it as the candid and correct exposition of the object of gentlemen opposed to the repeal. It was the doctrine of irresponsibility against the doctrine of responsibility. The latter, he had endeavored to show, characterized the Constitution of the United States. It was the doctrine of despotism, in opposition to the representative system. It was an express avowal, that the people were incompetent to govern themselves. This he believed to have been the great characteristic difference, from the commencement of the administration of the Government to the present day. If, indeed, there be a political corps necessary to interpose between the people and themselves, he considered the Judiciary corps, supported by the doctrines on this floor, well calculated to effect that object.

He said he would now examine the consequences of the doctrine against the repeal, as it respected the Legislature. He said it would have a direct tendency to impair the responsibility of the Representatives to the people. He could not illustrate this observation better than by giving the history of the law proposed to be repealed.

The first bill for changing the organization of the courts of the United States was reported to the House of Representatives the 11th of March, 1800; after undergoing some discussion and amendment, it was recommitted and reported again the 31st of March, 1800; on the 14th of April it was postponed by a majority of two votes. At this time the Presidential election was approaching, and the result uncertain. The bill upon which the law in question was founded, was reported to the House of Representatives the 19th December, 1800, and passed that House the 20th January, 1801. It was read in the Senate the 21st of January, 1801, and passed the 7th of February, 1801. At this time the Presidential election, so far as it respected the then existing President, was ascertained.

Mr. G. said, he proposed to be particular in ascertaining the facts respecting the passage of this law and its execution, because gentlemen had complained that rumors had gone into circulation respecting its passage, and the appointments under it, not warranted by the facts; a sense of justice had therefore induced him to make the strictest inquiry into the dates and facts, and the result of that inquiry, upon his mind, had been as unfavorable to its advocates as any impression which had been made by the rumors complained of. He said, at the time of passing the law, no complaints had been presented to Congress against the competency of the former system; not even a memorial from the bar of Philadelphia. He believed the former system to have been amply competent. The business, indeed, had very much declined; he observed that, in the Spring of 1799, the whole number of causes instituted, exclusive of Maryland and Tennessee, amounted to seven hundred and three, besides seventy-eight criminal prosecutions in Pennsylvania. In the Fall of 1800, there were instituted only three hundred and fifty-five; without any information, however, on this point, the law was passed. On the 13th of February, 1801, it was approved by the President. On turning to the Journals of that day, it will be found that the House of Representatives was not engaged in the ordinary business of the session; they were engaged in the extraordinary business of electing a President.

In a note made on that day on the Journals will be found a Message from the President in these words: "A Message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. Shaw, his Secretary, notifying that the President did this day approve and sign an act which originated in the House of Representatives, entitled 'An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States.'" Upon examining the Journals themselves, he said, he found an entry in these words: "The time agreed upon by the last mentioned vote being expired, the States proceeded in manner aforesaid to the twenty-ninth ballot; and, upon examination thereof, the result was declared to be the same." Mr. G. said, need I remind gentlemen, now present, who were agents in the exciting scenes, of the extraordinary situation of Congress at that moment? When in the House of Representatives the ordinary business of legislation was suspended, a permanent session decreed; when lodging and subsistence were furnished the members within the walls of the Chamber; when even a sick bed was introduced to enable its patient to discharge a sacred duty. Need I awaken the recollection of our fellow-citizens, who were looking with indignant anxiety on the awful scene; beholding their representatives, urged by the most tempestuous passions, and pushing forward to immolate the Constitution of their country? No, sir, the awful scene is freshly remembered! And what was its object? To prevent the fair and known expression of the public will in the highest function it has to perform—in the choice of the Chief Executive Magistrate of the nation. In this state of things, when all confidence amongst the members of this House was lost, in the highest paroxysm of party rage, was this law ushered into existence. And now its advocates gravely tell us to be calm—to guard against the danger of our passions. They tell us, at the same time, that the law they have passed is sacred! inviolable! irrepealable! Does it merit this extraordinary character from the circumstances which accompanied its passage? It does not.

Let us examine how this law was carried into effect. Members of the Legislature who voted for the passage of the law were appointed to offices, not indeed created by the law, the Constitution having wisely guarded against an effect of that sort, but to judicial offices previously created, by the removal, or what was called the promotion of judges from offices they then held, to the offices newly created, and supplying their places by members of the Legislature who voted for the creation of the new offices. In this substitution, however, it appears that no respect was paid to another provision of the Constitution. The sixth section of the first article of the Constitution contains these words: "No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." If vacancies had existed in the previously existing judicial establishments, the appointments of the members of the Legislature might not be considered as a direct breach of this provision in the Constitution; but this was not the fact, no vacancies did exist. It was necessary to make provision for members voting for the law that vacancies should be made by the removal or promotion of the then existing judges. This was done under this authority in the Constitution—second section, second article: and he, to wit, "the President of the United States shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors and other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States," &c. Again: "The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of the next session." How did the then President exercise the power in the present case? He did not wait until the vacancies should happen. He attempted to make vacancies by what he called the promotion of judges, although they held their commissions of him "during good behaviour;" and, without waiting to know whether the judges would accept the promotion or not, upon which event alone a vacancy could accrue, he proceeded to appoint and actually commission members of the Legislature to offices then actually held by other commissions granted to other persons. What was the effect of this procedure? That two persons held commissions to perform the same duties, although one person only was authorized by law to discharge those duties, whilst the office where the promotion was refused remained vacant. This was actually the case in several districts of the United States. This subject will be put into a still stronger point of view by examining the Journals of the Senate, which he was sorry to do for that purpose. When discussing the bill in question in the Senate, he found this entry on their Journals, "on motion to strike out the whole ' of the bill after the words 'from and after,' section first, line second, for the purpose of inserting as follows, to wit, a substitute for the bill." On the question to agree to this motion, it passed in the negative—yeas 13, nays 17. He observed among the nays the names of Mr. GREEN, of Rhode Island, and Mr. READ, of South Carolina. Both these gentlemen received appointments in virtue of the promotion of judges under this law. If these gentlemen had voted on the opposite side of the question, the law would never have been in existence. He mentioned this circumstance not to impugn the motives of any gentleman, but to demonstrate the temptation held out to the members of the Legislature under the doctrine contended for against the repeal of this law. The refusal of the present President to correct what was called a mistake in Mr. GREEN's appointment having excited some clamor, it was necessary to put that subject in a correct point of view. It seems, that in filling up Mr. GREEN's commission, the word "circuit," instead of the word "district," was inserted, it is presumed, by mistake. If the commission was intended for the circuit court, it was a breach of the Constitution in its most obvious letter. If it was intended for the district court, it was void ab initio: because, at the date of the commission, no vacancy had happened, and the President's right to appoint depended on that precedent condition, and he, therefore, in making the appointment, attempted to exercise a power he did not possess. It must be obvious to every gentleman that Mr. GREEN's accepting the commission, under all the incidents attending the case, could furnish but a negative recommendation of Mr. GREEN in his application for that or any other appointment. Upon a review of the history of the law in question, according to the doctrine of its advocates, the temptation to the Legislature to make permanent, irrevocable provision for themselves, must be obvious to every impartial observer. If, when a judicial establishment be once made, it becomes irrevocable, how easy would it be for a Legislature, combined with the Executive, to compensate themselves for the loss of the confidence of their constituents, by following the example before us? By erecting a new tier of judges, holding out to them additional emoluments, and by filling up the vacancies occasioned by their promotion with the members of the Legislature.

This operation would be most likely to take place when the Representatives had lost the confidence of their constituents, and of course less likely to be influenced by considerations of public good. Again, sir, the sinecure system thus established would have the advantage of all other similar systems existing in the world; because, if in other countries, the sinecure system has become oppressive to the people, they have the consolation to recollect, that the evil may be lessened by the competent authority; but, according to the doctrine upon which the system is bottomed in the United States, no remedy can be applied to the mischief by the union of all the responsible agents of the people. How, sir, would the framers of our Constitution lament, after all the care and circumspection they had used to exclude this system entirely from the practical operation of the Government, that the Constitution itself should be made the instrument of its introduction, and its permanent irrevocable establishment! And this, too, at the moment of an expiring Administration, when the passions of men just parting from power were breaking down every impediment which stood in the way of attaining their object! Upon the whole, therefore, it appears, that this doctrine of the irrepealability of laws derives no consideration from the consequences which naturally flow from it.

Mr. G. said, that having exhausted so great a portion of the time and attention of the Committee in discussing the Constitutional question, which had been made the cardinal point in the debate, he proposed to confine himself to very few observations upon the expediency of the contemplated repeal. He said he took it for granted, that the former Judicial system was competent to the discharge of all the judicial business in the United States; but if that should be denied, he thought it demonstrable from the document before the Committee. The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) had intimated a doubt whether the President had acted correctly in favoring us with the document. He should only observe in reply, that the Constitution imposed a duty upon the President, from time to time, to give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. He said that the number of suits in the courts of the United States must always be very small from the limited objects of their jurisdiction; this will appear by reading the second section of the third article of the Constitution, limiting their jurisdiction. The whole expense of the existing system is $137,000, of which forty or fifty thousand may be attributable to the new system, the estimates differing between these two sums. Whether the expense be estimated either according to the service to be rendered, or by comparison with any other system, it appeared to him to be enormous. He examined the document before us by way of ascertaining the relative view of expense and service, and also the competency of the former system to the discharge of the business. He would not, however, be responsible for precise clerical accuracy in his addition, which has also been deemed a subject worthy of criticism against the President of the United States. But if it be within twenty-five per cent. of being correct, it will demonstrate, first, that the former courts were competent to the business; secondly, that the number of causes bear no proportion to the expense of the institution.

Mr. G. said he would present to the view of the Committee the whole number of causes instituted at the respective sessions of the courts, from the Spring of 1796 to the Spring of 1801. He had fixed upon the year 1796, because the business began then to increase under the influence of the British Treaty. In all the circuit courts of the United States, except Maryland and Tennessee, the whole number of causes of every description instituted in the Spring of 1796, were two hundred and ninety-four; Fall, one hundred and ninety-two: 1797, Spring, four hundred and eighty-one; Fall, three hundred and ninety-seven: 1798, Spring, three hundred and twenty-five; Fall, three hundred and ninety-seven: 1799, Spring, seven hundred and three, exclusive of ninety-eight criminal prosecutions in Pennsylvania; Fall, four hundred and fifty-five: 1800, Spring, four hundred and fifty-one—seventy criminal prosecutions in Pennsylvania; Fall, three hundred and fifty-five: 1801, Spring, three hundred and fifty; making the common calculation of suits settled between the parties without trial, dismissions, abatements, &c., &c., and it would appear that the whole number of judgments against solvent persons would hardly compensate the expense of the institution. It also appears that the number of causes left to be tried could easily be decided by the six former judges.

Mr. G. said, upon looking over the number of suits in the Eastern circuit, it appeared to him strange, that the members representing that part of the country should insist upon increasing the expense of the system, when the courts have there scarcely any business to attend to; and that gentlemen in the Southern States, where the business was greater, should be willing to lessen the expense. He said he never heard the smallest complaint in the State he represented respecting the incompetency of the former courts to discharge the business in that State. He believed they had always gone through the docket, whenever they attended, and as far as his own observations went, that was the fact. He said, it appeared strange to him, that the new courts and new expenses should be called for in other parts of the United States, when the old courts were competent to the business in that State, where the business has been considerably more than in any other State, although it is now very much declined, and probably will decline still more. In the courts of Maine, West Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and West Tennessee, no suit at all had been instituted in June last.

Under the view of the subject thus presented, Mr. G. considered the late courts as useless and unnecessary, and the expense, therefore, was to him highly objectionable. He did not consider it in the nature of a compensation, for there was no equivalent rendition of service. He could not help considering it as a tribute for past services; as a tribute for the zeal displayed by these gentlemen in supporting principles which the people had denounced. He thought the federal maxim always was, "millions for defence, not a cent for tribute." He could not consent to tax the people even one cent, as a tribute to men, who disrespected their principles. Another objection he had to the new organization of the courts was, their tendency to produce a gradual demolition of State courts, by multiplying the number of courts, increasing their jurisdiction, making bonds or obligatory bills assignable, with the privilege of bringing suits in the name of the assignee, &c., or as gentlemen say, bringing federal justice to every man's door; the State courts will be ousted of their jurisdiction, which he thought by no means a desirable event. Under this consideration alone, and under the conviction he felt of the inutility of the courts, he should vote for the repeal.

Mr. G. concluded by observing, that, upon the whole view of the subject, feeling the firmest conviction that there is no Constitutional impediment in the way of repealing the act in question, upon the most fair and candid interpretation of the Constitution:—believing that principles advanced in opposition, go directly to the destruction of the fundamental principle of the Constitution, the responsibility of all public agents to the people—that they go to the establishment of a permanent corporation of individuals invested with ultimate censorial and controlling power over all the departments of the Government, over legislation, execution, and decision, and irresponsible to the people; believing that these principles are in direct hostility to the great principle of Representative Government; believing that the courts formerly established, were fully competent to the business they had to perform, and that the present courts are useless, unnecessary, and expensive; believing that the Supreme Court has heretofore discharged all the duties assigned to it in less than one month in the year, and that its duties could be performed in half that time; considering the compensations of the judges to be among the highest given to any of the highest officers of the United States for the services of the whole year; considering the compensations of all the judges greatly exceeding the services assigned them, as well as considering all the circumstances attending the substitution of the new system for the old one, by increasing the number of judges, and compensations, and lessening their duties by the distribution of the business into a great number of hands, &c., while acting under these impressions, he should vote against the motion now made for striking out the first section of the repealing bill.

FRIDAY, February 19.

A petition of sundry citizens of Huntingdon county, in the State of Pennsylvania, was presented to the House and read, praying a revision and amendment of the act of Congress passed on the eighteenth of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, entitled "An act supplementary to, and to amend the act, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the act heretofore passed on that subject.'"—Referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom was committed, on the twenty-sixth ultimo, the bill for revising and amending the acts concerning naturalization.

On motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolutions:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following articles be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, to wit:

1st. That the State Legislatures shall, from time to time, divide each State into districts, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives from such State in the Congress of the United States; and shall direct the mode of choosing an Elector of President and Vice President in each of the said districts, who shall be chosen by citizens having the qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature; and that the districts, so to be constituted shall consist, as nearly as may be, of contiguous territory, and of equal proportion of population, except where there may be any detached portion of territory, not of itself sufficient to form a district, which then shall be annexed to some other portion nearest thereto; which districts, when so divided, shall remain unalterable until a new census of the United States shall be taken.

2d. That, in all future elections of President and Vice President, the persons voted for shall be particularly designated, by declaring which is voted for as President, and which as Vice President.

Ordered, That the said motion, together with the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York, proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the choice of a President and Vice President, which were read and ordered to lie on the table on the fifteenth instant, be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States and for other purposes."

Mr. BAYARD.—Mr. Chairman, I must be allowed to express my surprise at the course pursued by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES,) in the remarks which he has made on the subject before us. I had expected that he would have adopted a different line of conduct. I had expected it as well from that sentiment of magnanimity which ought to have been inspired by a sense of the high ground he holds on the floor of this House, as from the professions of a desire to conciliate, which he has so repeatedly made during the session. We have been invited to bury the hatchet, and brighten the chain of peace. We were disposed to meet on middle ground. We had assurances from the gentleman that he would abstain from reflections on the past, and his only wish was that we might unite in future in promoting the welfare of our common country. We confided in the gentleman's sincerity, and cherished the hope, that if the divisions of party were not banished from the House, its spirit would be less intemperate. Such were our impressions, when the mask was suddenly thrown aside, and we saw the torch of discord lighted and blazing before our eyes. Every effort has been made to revive the animosities of the House, and inflame the passions of the nation. I am at no loss to perceive why this course has been pursued. The gentleman has been unwilling to rely upon the strength of his subject, and has therefore determined to make the measure a party question. He has probably secured success, but would it not have been more honorable and more commendable to have left the decision of a great Constitutional question to the understanding, and not to the prejudices of the House? It was my ardent wish to discuss the subject with calmness and deliberation, and I did intend to avoid every topic which could awaken the sensibility of party. This was my temper and design when I took my seat yesterday. It is a course at present we are no longer at liberty to pursue. The gentleman has wandered far, very far, from the points of the debate, and has extended his animadversions to all the prominent measures of the former Administrations. In following him through his preliminary observations, I necessarily lose sight of the bill upon your table.

The gentleman commenced his strictures with the philosophic observation, that it was the fate of mankind to hold different opinions as to the form of government which was preferable. That some were attached to the monarchal, while others thought the republican more eligible. This, as an abstract remark, is certainly true, and could have furnished no ground of offence, if it had not evidently appeared that an allusion was designed to be made to the parties in this country. Does the gentleman suppose that we have a less lively recollection than himself of the oath which we have taken to support the Constitution; that we are less sensible of the spirit of our Government, or less devoted to the wishes of our constituents? Whatever impression it might be the intention of the gentleman to make, he does not believe that there exists in the country an anti-republican party. He will not venture to assert such an opinion on the floor of this House. That there may be a few individuals having a preference for monarchy is not improbable; but will the gentleman from Virginia, or any other gentleman, affirm in his place, that there is a party in the country who wish to establish monarchy? Insinuations of this sort belong not to the Legislature of the Union. Their place is an election ground or an alehouse. Within these walls they are lost; abroad, they have an effect, and I fear are still capable of abusing the popular credulity.

We were next told of the parties which have existed, divided by the opposite views of promoting Executive power and guarding the rights of the people. The gentleman did not tell us in plain language, but he wished it to be understood, that he and his friends were the guardians of the people's rights, and that we were the advocates of Executive power.

I know that this is the distinction of party which some gentlemen have been anxious to establish; but this is not the ground on which we divide. I am satisfied with the Constitutional powers of the Executive, and never wished nor attempted to increase them; and I do not believe that gentlemen on the other side of the House ever had a serious apprehension of danger from an increase of Executive authority. No, sir, our views as to the powers which do and ought to belong to the General and State governments, are the true sources of our divisions. I co-operate with the party to which I am attached, because I believe their true object and end is an honest and efficient support of the General Government, in the exercise of the legitimate powers of the Constitution.

I pray to God I may be mistaken in the opinion I entertain as to the designs of gentlemen to whom I am opposed. Those designs I believe hostile to the powers of this Government. State pride extinguishes a national sentiment. Whatever is taken from this Government is given to the States.

The ruins of this Government aggrandize the States. There are States which are too proud to be controlled; whose sense of greatness and resource renders them indifferent to our protection, and induces a belief, that if no General Government existed, their influence would be more extensive, and their importance more conspicuous. There are gentlemen who make no secret of an extreme point of depression, to which the Government is to be sunk. To that point we are rapidly progressing. But I would beg gentlemen to remember, that human affairs are not to be arrested in their course, at artificial points. The impulse now given may be accelerated by causes at present out of view. And when those who now design well, wish to stop, they may find their powers unable to resist the torrent. It is not true that we ever wished to give a dangerous strength to Executive power. While the Government was in our hands, it was our duty to maintain its Constitutional balance, by preserving the energies of each branch. There never was an attempt to vary the relation of its powers. The struggle was to maintain the Constitutional powers of the Executive. The wild principles of French liberty were scattered through the country. We had our Jacobins and disorganizers. They saw no difference between a King and a President, and as the people of France had put down their King, they thought the people of America ought to put down their President. They who considered the Constitution as securing all the principles of rational and practicable liberty, who were unwilling to embark upon the tempestuous sea of revolution, in pursuit of visionary schemes, were denounced as monarchists. A line was drawn between the Government and the people, and the friends of the Government were marked as the enemies of the people. I hope, however, that the Government and the people are now the same; and I pray to God that what has been frequently remarked may not in this case be discovered to be true, that they who have the name of people the most often in their mouths, have their true interests the most seldom at their hearts.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia wandered to the very confines of the Federal Administration, in search of materials the most inflammable and most capable of kindling the passions of his party.

He represents the Government as seizing the first moment which presented itself to create a dependent moneyed interest, ever devoted to its views. What are we to understand by this remark of the gentleman? Does he mean to say that Congress did wrong in funding the public debt? Does he mean to say that the price of our liberty and independence ought not to have been paid? Is he bold enough to denounce this measure as one of the Federal victims marked for destruction? Is it the design to tell us that its day has not yet come, but is approaching; and that the funding system is to add to the pile of Federal ruins? Do I hear the gentleman say we will reduce the Army to a shadow; we will give the Navy to the worms; the Mint, which presented the people with the emblems of their liberty, and of their sovereignty, we will abolish; the revenue shall depend upon the winds and waves; the judges shall be made our creatures, and the great work shall be crowned and consecrated by relieving the country from an odious and oppressive public debt? These steps, I presume, are to be taken in progression. The gentleman will pause at each, and feel the public pulse. As the fever increases he will proceed, and the moment of delirium will be seized to finish the great work of destruction.

The assumption of the State debts has been made an article of distinct crimination. It has been ascribed to the worst motives—to a design of increasing a dependent moneyed interest. Is it not well known that those debts were part of the price of our Revolution? That they rose in the exigency of our affairs, from the efforts of the particular States, at times when the Federal arm could not be extended to their relief? Each State was entitled to the protection of the Union, the defence was a common burden, and every State had a right to expect that the expenses attending its individual exertions in the general cause, would be reimbursed from the public purse. I shall be permitted further to add, that the United States, having absorbed the sources of State revenue, except direct taxation, which was required for the support of the State governments, the assumption of these debts was necessary to save some of the States from bankruptcy.

The internal taxes are made one of the crimes of the Federal Administration. They were imposed, says the gentleman, to create a host of dependents on Executive favor. This supposes the past Administrations to have been not only very wicked, but very weak. They laid taxes in order to strengthen their influence. Who is so ignorant as not to know, that the imposition of a tax would create an hundred enemies for one friend? The name of excise was odious; the details of collection were unavoidably expensive, and it was to operate upon a part of the community least disposed to support public burdens, and most ready to complain of their weight. A little experience will give the gentleman a new idea of the patronage of this Government. He will find it not that dangerous weapon in the hands of the Administration which he has heretofore supposed it; he will probably discover that the poison is accompanied by its antidote, and that an appointment of the Government, while it gives to the Administration one lazy friend, will raise up against it ten active enemies. No! The motive ascribed for the imposition of the internal taxes is as unfounded as it is uncharitable. The Federal Administration, in creating burdens to support the credit of the nation, and to supply the means of its protection, knew that they risked the favor of those upon whom their power depended. They were willing to be the victims when the public good required.

The duties on imports and tonnage furnished a precarious revenue—a revenue at all times exposed to deficiency, from causes beyond our reach. The internal taxes offered a fund less liable to be impaired by accident—a fund which did not rob the mouth of labor, but was derived from the gratification of luxury. These taxes are an equitable distribution of the public burdens. Through this medium the Western country is enabled to contribute something to the expenses of a Government which has expended and daily expends such large sums for its defence. When these taxes were laid they were indispensable. With the aid of them it has been difficult to prevent an increase of the public debt. And notwithstanding the fair prospects which now dazzle our eyes, I undertake to say, if you abolish them this session, you will be obliged to restore them or supply their place by a direct tax before the end of two years. Will the gentleman say, that the direct tax was laid in order to enlarge the bounds of patronage? Will he deny that this was a measure to which we had been urged for years by our adversaries, because they foresaw in it the ruin of Federal power? My word for it, no Administration will ever be strengthened by a patronage united with taxes which the people are sensible of paying.

We were next told, that to get an army an Indian war was necessary. The remark was extremely bald, as the honorable gentleman did not allege a single reason for the position. He did not undertake to state that it was a wanton war, or provoked by the Government. He did not even venture to deny, that it was a war of defence, and entered into in order to protect our brethren on the frontiers from the bloody scalping-knife and murderous tomahawk of the savage. What ought the Government to have done? Ought they to have estimated the value of the blood which probably would be shed, and the amount of the devastation likely to be committed before they determined on resistance? They raised an army, and after great expense and various fortune, they have secured the peace and safety of the frontiers. But why was the Army mentioned on this occasion, unless to forewarn us of the fate which awaits them, and to tell us that their days are numbered? I cannot suppose that the gentleman mentioned this little army, distributed on a line of three thousand miles, for the purpose of giving alarm to three hundred thousand free and brave yeomanry, ever ready to defend the liberties of the country.

The honorable gentleman proceeded to inform the Committee, that the Government, availing itself of the depredations of the Algerines, created a navy. Did the gentleman mean to insinuate, that this war was invited by the United States? Has he any documents or proof to render the suspicion colorable? No, sir, he has none. He well knows that the Algerine aggressions were extremely embarrassing to the Government. When they commenced, we had no marine force to oppose to them. We had no harbors or places of shelter in the Mediterranean. A war with these pirates could be attended with neither honor nor profit. It might cost a great deal of blood, and in the end it might be feared that a contest so far from home, subject to numberless hazards and difficulties, could not be maintained. What would gentlemen have had the Government to do? I know there are those who are ready to answer: abandon the Mediterranean trade. But would this have done? The corsairs threatened to pass the Straits, and were expected in the Atlantic. Nay, sir, it was thought that our very coasts would not have been secure.

Will gentlemen go further, and say that the United States ought to relinquish their commerce. It has been said that we ought to be cultivators of the earth, and make the nations of Europe our carriers. This is not an occasion to examine the solidity of this opinion; but I will only ask, admitting the Administration were disposed to turn the pursuits of the people of this country from the ocean to the land, whether there is a power in the Government, or whether there would be if we were as strong as the Government of Turkey, or even of France, to accomplish the object? With a seacoast of seventeen hundred miles, with innumerable harbors and inlets, with a people enterprising beyond example, is it possible to say, you will have no ships or sailors, nor merchants? The people of this country will never consent to give up their navigation, and every Administration will find themselves constrained to provide means to protect their commerce.

In respect to the Algerines, the late Administration were singularly unfortunate. They were obliged to fight or pay them. The true policy was to hold a purse in one hand and a sword in the other. This was the policy of the Government. Every commercial nation in Europe was tributary to these petty barbarians. It was not esteemed disgraceful. It was an affair of calculation, and the Administration made the best bargain in their power. They have heretofore been scandalized for paying tribute to a pirate, and now they are criminated for preparing a few frigates to protect our citizens from slavery and chains! Sir, I believe on this and many other occasions, if the finger of Heaven had pointed out a course, and the Government had pursued it, yet that they would not have escaped the censure and reproaches of their enemies.

We were told that the disturbances in Europe were made a pretext for augmenting the Army and Navy. I will not, Mr. Chairman, at present go into a detailed view of the events which compelled the Government to put on the armor of defence, and to resist by force the French aggressions. All the world know the efforts which were made to accomplish an amicable adjustment of differences with that Power. It is enough to state, that Ambassadors of peace were twice repelled from the shores of France with ignominy and contempt. It is enough to say, that it was not till after we had drunk the cup of humiliation to the dregs, that the national spirit was roused to a manly resolution, to depend only on their God and their own courage for protection. What, sir, did it grieve the gentleman that we did not crouch under the rod of the Mighty Nation, and, like the petty Powers of Europe, tamely surrender our independence? Would he have had the people of the United States relinquish without a struggle those liberties which had cost so much blood and treasure? We had not, sir, recourse to arms, till the mouths of our rivers were choked with French corsairs; till our shores, and every harbor, were insulted and violated; till half our commercial capital had been seized, and no safety existed for the remainder but the protection of force. At this moment a noble enthusiasm electrized the country; the national pulse beat high, and we were prepared to submit to every sacrifice, determined only that our independence should be the last. At that time an American was a proud name in Europe; but I fear, much I fear, that in the course we are now likely to pursue, the time will soon arrive when our citizens abroad will be ashamed to acknowledge their country.

The measures of 1798 grew out of the public feelings; they were loudly demanded by the public voice. It was the people who drove the Government to arms, and not (as the gentleman expressed it) the Government which pushed the people to the X, Y, Z, of the political designs before they understood the A, B, C, of their political principles.

But what, sir, did the gentleman mean by his X, Y, Z? I must look for something very significant—something more than a quaintness of expression, or a play upon words—in what falls from a gentleman of his learning and ability. Did he mean that the despatches which contained those letters were impostures, designed to deceive and mislead the people of America—intended to rouse a false spirit not justified by events? Though the gentleman had no respect for some of the characters of that embassy; though he felt no respect for the Chief Justice, or the gentleman appointed from South Carolina—two characters as pure, as honorable, and exalted, as any the country can boast of—yet I should have expected that he would have felt some tenderness for Mr. Gerry, in whom his party had since given proofs of undiminished confidence. Does the gentleman believe that Mr. Gerry would have joined in the deception, and assisted in fabricating a tale, which was to blind his countrymen, and to enable the Government to destroy their liberties? Sir, I will not avail myself of the equivocations or confessions of Talleyrand himself: I say these gentlemen will not dare publicly to deny what is attested by the hand and seal of Mr. Gerry.

The truth of these despatches admitted, what was your Government to do? Give us, say the Directory, 1,200,000 livres for our own purse, and purchase $15,000,000 of Dutch debt, (which was worth nothing,) and we will receive your Ministers, and negotiate for peace.

It was only left to the Government to choose between an unconditional surrender of the honor and independence of the country, or a manly resistance. Can you blame, sir, the Administration for a line of conduct which has reflected on the nation so much honor, and to which, under God, it owes its present prosperity?

These are the events of the General Government which the gentleman has reviewed, in succession, and endeavored to render odious or suspicious. For all this I could have forgiven him, but there is one thing for which I will not, I cannot, forgive him—I mean his attempt to disturb the ashes of the dead; to disturb the ashes of the great and good WASHINGTON! Sir, I might degrade by attempting to eulogize this illustrious character. The work is infinitely beyond my powers. I will only say that, as long as exalted talents and virtues confer honor among men, the name of WASHINGTON will be held in veneration.

After, Mr. Chairman, the honorable member had exhausted one quiver of arrows against the late Executive, he opened another, equally poisoned, against the Judiciary. He has told us, sir, that when the power of the Government was rapidly passing from Federal hands—after we had heard the thundering voice of the people which dismissed us from their service—we erected a Judiciary, which we expected would afford us the shelter of an inviolable sanctuary. The gentleman is deceived. We knew better, sir, the characters who were to succeed us, and we knew that nothing was sacred in the eyes of infidels. No, sir, I never had a thought that anything belonging to the Federal Government was holy in the eyes of those gentlemen. I could never, therefore, imagine that a sanctuary could be built up which would not be violated. I believe these gentlemen regard public opinion, because their power depends upon it; but I believe they respect no existing establishment of the Government; and if public opinion could be brought to support them, I have no doubt they would annihilate the whole. I shall at present only say further, on this head, that we thought the reorganization of the Judicial system a useful measure, and we considered it as a duty to employ the remnant of our power to the best advantage of our country.

The honorable gentleman expressed his joy that the Constitution had at last become sacred in our eyes: that we formerly held that it meant everything or nothing. I believe, sir, that the Constitution formerly appeared different in our eyes from what it appears in the eyes of the dominant party. We formerly saw in it the principles of a fair and goodly creation. We looked upon it as a source of peace, of safety, of honor, and of prosperity, to the country. But now the view is changed; it is the instrument of wild and dark destruction; it is a weapon which is to prostrate every establishment to which the nation owes the unexampled blessings which it enjoys.

The present state of the country is an unanswerable commentary upon our construction of the Constitution. It is true that we made it mean much; and hope, sir, we shall not be taught by the present Administration that it can mean even worse than nothing.

The gentleman has not confined his animadversions to the individual establishment, but has gone so far as to make the judges the subject of personal invective. They have been charged with having transgressed the bounds of Judicial duty, and become the apostles of a political sect. We have heard of their travelling about the country for little other purpose than to preach the Federal doctrines to the people.

Sir, I think a judge should never be a partisan. No man would be more ready to condemn a judge who carried his political prejudices or antipathies on the bench. But I have still to learn that such a charge can be sustained against the judges of the United States.

The Constitution is the supreme law of the land, and they have taken pains, in their charges to grand juries, to unfold and explain its principles. Upon similar occasions, they have enumerated the laws which compose our criminal code, and when some of those laws have been denounced by the enemies of the Administration as unconstitutional, the judges may have felt themselves called upon to express their judgments upon that point, and the reasons of their opinions.

So far, but no farther, I believe, the judges have gone. In going thus far, they have done nothing more than faithfully discharge their duty.

But if, sir, they have offended against the Constitution or laws of the country, why are they not impeached? The gentleman now holds the sword of justice. The judges are not a privileged order; they have no shelter but their innocence. But, in any view, are the sins of the former judges to be fastened upon the new Judicial system? Would you annihilate a system because some men under part of it had acted wrong? The Constitution has pointed out a mode of punishing and removing the men, and does not leave this miserable pretext for the wanton exercise of powers which is now contemplated.

The honorable member has thought himself justified in making a charge of a serious and frightful nature against the judges. They have been represented going about searching out victims of the Sedition law. But no fact has been stated; no proof has been adduced, and the gentleman must excuse me for refusing my belief to the charge till it is sustained by stronger and better ground than assertion.

If, however, Mr. Chairman, the eyes of the gentleman are delighted with victims, if objects of misery are grateful to his feelings, let me turn his view from the walks of the judges to the track of the present Executive. It is in this path we see the real victims of stern, uncharitable, unrelenting power. It is here, sir, we see the soldier who fought the battles of the Revolution; who spilt his blood and wasted his strength to establish the independence of his country, deprived of the reward of his services, and left to pine in penury and wretchedness. It is along this path that you may see helpless children crying for bread, and gray hairs sinking in sorrow to the grave! It is here that no innocence, no merit, no truth, no services, can save the unhappy secretary who does not believe in the creed of those in power. I have been forced upon this subject, and before I leave it, allow me to remark, that without inquiring into the right of the President to make vacancies in office, during the recess of the Senate, but admitting the power to exist, yet that it never was given by the Constitution to enable the Chief Magistrate to punish the insults, to revenge the wrongs, or to indulge the antipathies of the man. If the discretion exists, I have no hesitation in saying that it is abused when exercised from any other motives than the public good. And when I see the will of a President precipitating from office men of probity, knowledge, and talents, against whom the community has no complaint, I consider it as a wanton and dangerous abuse of power. And when I see men who have been the victims of this abuse of power, I view them as the proper objects of national sympathy and commiseration.

Among the causes of impeachment against the judges, is their attempt to force the sovereignties of the States to bow before them. We have heard them called an ambitious body politic; and the fact I allude to has been considered as full proof of the inordinate ambition of the body.

Allow me to say, sir, the gentleman knows too much not to know that the judges are not a body politic. He supposed, perhaps, there was an odium attached to the appellation, which it might serve his purposes to connect with the judges. But, sir, how do you derive any evidence of the ambition of the judges from their decision that the States under our Federal compact were compellable to do justice? Can it be shown, or even said, that the judgment of the court was a false construction of the Constitution? The policy of later times on this point has altered the Constitution, and, in my opinion, has obliterated its fairest features. I am taught by my principles, that no power ought to be superior to justice. It is not that I wish to see the States humbled in dust and ashes; it is not that I wish to see the pride of any man flattered by their degradation; but it is that I wish to see the great and the small, the sovereign and the subject, bow at the altar of justice, and submit to those obligations from which the Deity himself is not exempt. What was the effect of this provision in the Constitution? It prevented the States being the judges in their own cause, and deprived them of the power of denying justice. Is there a principle of ethics more clear than that a man ought not to be a judge in his own cause, and is not the principle equally strong when applied not to one man, but to a collective body? It was the happiness of our situation which enabled us to force the greatest State to submit to the yoke of justice, and it would have been the glory of the country in the remotest times, if the principle in the Constitution had been maintained. What had the States to dread? Could they fear injustice when opposed to a feeble individual? Has a great man reason to fear from a poor one? And could a potent State be alarmed by the unfounded claim of a single person? For my part I have always thought that an independent tribunal ought to be provided to judge on the claims against this Government. The power ought not to be in our own hands. We are not impartial, and are therefore liable, without our knowledge, to do wrong. I never could see why the whole community should not be bound by as strong an obligation to do justice to an individual, as one man is bound to do it to another.

In England the subject has a better chance for justice against the Sovereign than in this country a citizen has against a State. The Crown is never its own arbiter, and they who sit in judgment have no interest in the event of their decision.

The judges, sir, have been criminated for their conduct in relation to the Sedition act, and have been charged with searching for victims who were sacrificed under it. The charge is easily made, but has the gentleman the means of supporting it? It was the evident design of the gentleman to attach the odium of the Sedition law to the Judiciary; on this score the judges are surely innocent. They did not pass the act; the Legislature made the law, and they were obliged by their oaths to execute it. The judges decided the law to be Constitutional, and I am not now going to agitate the question. I did hope, when the law passed, that its effect would be useful. It did not touch the freedom of speech, and was designed only to restrain the enormous abuses of the press. It went no further than to punish malicious falsehoods, published with the wicked intention of destroying the Government. No innocent man ever did or could have suffered under the law. No punishment could be inflicted till a jury was satisfied that a publication was false, and that the party charged, knowing it to be false, had published it with an evil design.

The misconduct of the judges, however, on this subject, has been considered by the gentleman the more aggravated, by an attempt to extend the principles of the Sedition act, by an adoption of those of the common law. Connected with this subject, such an attempt was never made by the judges. They have held generally, that the Constitution of the United States was predicated upon an existing common law. Of the soundness of that opinion, I never had a doubt. I should scarcely go too far, were I to say, that, stripped of the common law, there would be neither Constitution nor Government. The Constitution is unintelligible without reference to the common law. And were we to go into our courts of justice with the mere statutes of the United States, not a step could be taken, not even a contempt could be punished. Those statutes prescribe no forms of pleadings; they contain no principles of evidence; they furnish no rule of property. If the common law does not exist in most cases, there is no law but the will of the judge.

I have never contended that the whole of the common law attached to the Constitution, but only such parts as were consonant to the nature and spirit of our Government. We have nothing to do, with the law of the Ecclesiastical Establishment, nor with any principle of monarchical tendency. What belongs to us, and what is unsuitable, is a question for the sound discretion of the judges. The principle is analogous to one which is found in the writings of all jurists and commentators. When a Colony is planted, it is established subject to such parts of the law of the mother country as are applicable to its situation. When our forefathers colonized the wilderness of America, they brought with them the common law of England. They claimed it as their birthright, and they left it as the most valuable inheritance to their children. Let me say, that this same common law, now so much despised and villified, is the cradle of the rights and liberties which we now enjoy. It is to the common law we owe our distinction from the colonists of France, of Portugal, and of Spain. How long is it since we have discovered the malignant qualities which are now ascribed to this law? Is there a State in the Union which has not adopted it, and in which it is not in force? Why is it refused to the Federal Constitution? Upon the same principle that every power is denied which tends to invigorate the Government. Without this law the Constitution becomes, what perhaps many gentlemen wish to see it, a dead letter.

For ten years it has been the doctrine of our courts, that the common law was in force, and yet can gentlemen say, that there has been a victim who has suffered under it? Many have experienced its protection, none can complain of its oppression.

In order to demonstrate the aspiring ambition of this body politic, the Judiciary, the honorable gentleman stated with much emphasis and feeling that the judges had been hardy enough to send their mandate into the Executive cabinet. Was the gentleman, sir, acquainted with the fact when he made this statement? It differs essentially from what I know I have heard upon the subject. I shall be allowed to state the fact.

Several commissions had been made out by the late Administration for justices of the peace of this Territory. The commissions were complete; they were signed and sealed, and left with the clerks of the Office of State to be handed to the persons appointed. The new Administration found them on the Clerk's table, and thought proper to withhold them. These officers are not dependent on the will of the President. The persons named in the commissions considered that their appointments were complete, and that the detention of their commissions was a wrong, and not justified by the legitimate authority of the Executive. They applied to the Supreme Court for a rule upon the Secretary of State, to show cause why a mandamus should not issue, commanding him to deliver up the commissions. Let me ask, sir, what could the judges do? The rule to show cause was a matter of course upon a new point, at least doubtful. To have denied it, would have been to shut the doors of justice against the parties. It concludes nothing, neither the jurisdiction nor the regularity of the act. The judges did their duty; they gave an honorable proof of their independence. They listened to the complaint of an individual against your President, and have shown themselves disposed to grant redress against the greatest man in the Government. If a wrong has been committed, and the Constitution authorizes their interference, will gentlemen say that the Secretary of State, or even the President, is not subject to law? And if they violate the law, where can we apply for redress but to our courts of justice? But, sir, it is not true that the judges issued their mandate to the Executive; they have only called upon the Secretary of State to show them that what he has done is right. It is but an incipient proceeding which decides nothing.

Mr. GILES rose to explain. He said that the gentleman from Delaware had ascribed to him many things which he did not say, and had afterwards undertaken to refute them. He had only said that mandatory process had issued; that the course pursued by the court indicated a belief by them that they had jurisdiction, and that in the event of no cause being shewn, a mandamus would issue.]

Mr. BAYARD.—I stated the gentleman's words as I took them down. It is immaterial whether the mistake was in the gentleman's expression or in my understanding. He has a right to explain, and I will take his position as he now states it. I deny, sir, that mandatory process has issued. Such process would be imperative, and suppose a jurisdiction to exist; the proceeding which has taken place, is no more than notice of the application for justice made to the court, and allows the party to show, either that no wrong has been committed, or that the court has no jurisdiction over the subject. Even, sir, if the rule were made absolute, and the mandamus issued, it would not be definitive, but it would be competent for the Secretary in a return to the writ, to justify the act which has been done, or to show that it is not a subject of judicial cognizance.

It is not till after an insufficient return that a peremptory mandamus issues. In this transaction, so far from seeing anything culpable in the conduct of your judges, I think, sir, that they have given a strong proof of the value of that Constitutional provision which makes them independent. They are not terrified by the frowns of Executive power, and dare to judge between the rights of a citizen and the pretensions of a President.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, I have gone through most of the preliminary remarks which the honorable gentleman thought proper to make before he proceeded to the consideration of those points which properly belong to the subject before the Committee. I have not supposed the topics I have been discussing had any connexion with the bill on your table; but I felt it as a duty not to leave unanswered charges against the former Administrations and our judges, of the most insidious tendency, which I know to be unfounded, which were calculated and designed to influence the decision on the measure now proposed. Why, Mr. Chairman, has the present subject been combined with the Army, the Navy, the internal taxes and the Sedition law? Was it to involve them in one common odium, and consign them to one common fate? Do I see in the preliminary remarks of the honorable member the title-page of the volume of measures which are to be pursued? Are gentlemen sensible of the extent to which it is designed to lead them? They are now called on to reduce the Army, to diminish the Navy, to abolish the Mint, to destroy the independence of the Judiciary, and will they be able to stop when they are next required to blot out the public debt, that hateful source of moneyed interest and aristocratic influence? Be assured, sir, we see but a small part of the system which has been formed. Gentlemen know the advantage of progressive proceedings, and my life for it, if they can carry the people with them, their career will not be arrested while a trace remains of what was done by the former Administrations.

There was another remark of the honorable member which I must be allowed to notice. The pulpit, sir, has not escaped invective. The ministers of the Gospel have been represented, like the judges, forgetting the duties of their calling, and employed in disseminating the heresies of Federalism. Am I then, sir, to understand that religion is also denounced, and that your churches are to be shut up? Are we to be deprived, sir, both of law and Gospel? Where do the principles of the gentlemen end? When the system of reform is completed, what will remain? I pray God that this flourishing country, which, under his Providence, has attained such a height of prosperity, may yet escape the desolation suffered by another nation, by the practice of similar doctrines.

I beg pardon of the Committee for having consumed so much time upon points so little connected with the subject of the debate. Till I heard the honorable member from Virginia yesterday, I was prepared only to discuss the merits of the bill upon which you are called to vote. His preliminary remarks were designed to have an effect which I deemed it material to endeavor to counteract, and I therefore yielded to the necessity of pursuing the course he had taken, though I was conscious of departing very far from the subject before the Committee. To the discussion of that subject I now return with great satisfaction, and shall consider it under the two views it naturally presents; the constitutionality and the expediency of the measure. I find it most convenient to consider first the question of expediency, and shall therefore beg leave to invert the natural order of the inquiry.

To show the inexpediency of the present bill, I shall endeavor to prove the expediency of the Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

judicial law of the last session. In doing this it will be necessary to take a view of the leading features of the pre-existing system, to inquire into its defects, and to examine how far the evils complained of were remedied by the provisions of the late act. It is not my intention to enter into the details of the former system; it can be necessary only to state so much as will distinctly shew its defects.

There existed, sir, a Supreme Court, having original cognizance in a few cases, but principally a court of appellate jurisdiction. This was the great national court of dernier resort. Before this tribunal, questions of unlimited magnitude and consequence, both of a civil and political nature, received their final decision; and I may be allowed to call it the national crucible of justice, in which the judgments of inferior courts were to be reduced to their elements and cleansed from every impurity. There was a Circuit Court, composed in each district of a judge of the Supreme Court and the district judge. This was the chief court of business both of a civil and criminal nature.

In each district a court was established for affairs of revenue, and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. It is not necessary for the purposes of the present argument to give a more extensive outline of the former plan of our Judiciary. We discover that the judges of the Supreme Court, in consequence of their composing a part of the circuit courts, were obliged to travel from one extremity to the other of this extensive country. In order to be in the court-house two months in the year they were forced to be upon the road six. The Supreme Court being the court of last resort, having final jurisdiction over questions of incalculable importance, ought certainly to be filled with men not only of probity, but of great talents, learning, patience, and experience. The union of these qualities, is rarely, very rarely found in men who have not passed the meridian of life. My Lord Coke tells us no man is fit to be a judge until he has numbered the lucubrations of twenty years. Men of studious habits are seldom men of strong bodies. In the course of things it could not be expected that men fit to be judges of your Supreme Courts would be men capable of traversing the mountains and wildernesses of this extensive country? It was an essential and great defect in this court, that it required in men the combination of qualities, which it is a phenomenon to find united. It required that they should possess the learning and experience of years and the strength and activity of youth. I may say further, Mr. Chairman, that this court, from its constitution, tended to deterioration and not to improvement. Your judges, instead of being in their closets and increasing by reflection and study their stock of wisdom and knowledge, had not even the means of repairing the ordinary waste of time. Instead of becoming more learned and more capable, they would gradually lose the fruits of their former industry. Let me ask if this was not a vicious construction of a court of the highest authority and greatest importance in the nation? In a court from which no one had an appeal and to whom it belonged to establish the leading principles of national jurisprudence?

In the constitution of this court, as a court of last resort, there was another essential defect. The appeals to this court are from the circuit courts. The circuit court consists of the district judge, and a judge of the Supreme Court. In cases where the district judge is interested, where he has been counsel, and where he has decided in the court below, the judge of the Supreme Court alone composes the circuit court. What, then, is substantially the nature of this appellate jurisdiction? In truth and practice, the appeal is from a member of a court to the body of the same court. The circuit courts are but emanations of the Supreme Court. Cast your eyes upon the Supreme Court; you see it disappear, and its members afterwards arising in the shape of circuit judges. Behold the circuit judges; they vanish, and immediately you perceive the form of the Supreme Court appearing. There is, sir, a magic in this arrangement which is not friendly to justice. When the Supreme Court assembles, appeals come from the various circuits of the United States. There are appeals from the decisions of each judge. The judgments of each member pass in succession under the revision of the whole body. Will not a judge, while he is examining the sentence of a brother to-day, remember that that brother will sit in judgment upon his proceedings to-morrow? Are the members of a court thus constituted, free from all motive, exempt from all bias, which could even remotely influence opinion on the point of strict right? and yet let me ask emphatically, whether this court, being the court of final resort, should not be so constituted that the world should believe and every suitor be satisfied, that in weighing the justice of a cause, nothing entered the scales but its true merits?

Your Supreme Court, sir, I have never considered as anything more than the judges of assize sitting in bank. It is a system with which perhaps I should find no fault, if the judges sitting in bank did not exercise a final jurisdiction. Political institutions should be so calculated as not to depend upon the virtues, but to guard against the vices and weaknesses of men. It is possible that a judge of the Supreme Court would not be influenced by the esprit du corps, that he would neither be gratified by the affirmation, nor mortified by the reversal of his opinions; but this, sir, is estimating the strength and purity of human nature upon a possible, but not on its ordinary scale.

I believe, said Mr. B., that in practice the formation of the Supreme Court frustrated, in a great degree, the design of its institution. I believe that many suitors were discouraged from seeking a revision of the opinions of the circuit court, by a deep impression of the difficulties to be surmounted in obtaining the reversal of the judgment of a court from the brethren of the judge who pronounced the judgment. The benefit of a court of appeals, well constituted, is not confined to the mere act of reviewing the sentence of an inferior court; but is more extensively useful by the general operation of the knowledge of its existence upon inferior courts. The power of uncontrollable decision is of the most delicate and dangerous nature. When exercised in the courts, it is more formidable than by any other branch of our Government. It is the Judiciary only which can reach the person, the property, or life of an individual. The exercise of their power is scattered over separate cases, and creates no common cause. The great safety under this power arises from the right of appeal. A sense of this right combines the reputation of the judge with the justice of the cause. In my opinion, it is a strong proof of the wisdom of a Judicial system when few causes are carried into the court of the last resort. I would say, if it were not paradoxical, that the very existence of a court of appeals ought to destroy the occasion for it. The conscience of the judge, sir, will no doubt be a great check upon him in the unbounded field of discretion created by the uncertainty of law; but I should, in general cases, more rely upon the effect produced by his knowledge, than an inadvertent or designed abuse of power was liable to be corrected by a superior tribunal. A court of appellate jurisdiction, organized upon sound principles, should exist, though few causes arose for their decision; for it is surely better to have a court and no causes, than to have causes and no court. I now proceed, sir, to consider the defects which are plainly discernable, or which have been discovered by practice in the constitution of the circuit courts. These courts, from information which I have received, I apprehend were originally constructed upon a fallacious principle. I have heard it stated that the design of placing the judges of the Supreme Court in the circuit courts, was to establish uniform rules of decision throughout the United States. It was supposed that the presiding judges of the circuit courts, proceeding from the same body, would tend to identify the principles and rules of decision in the several districts. In practice, a contrary effect has been discovered to be produced by the peculiar organization of these courts. In practice we have found not only a want of uniformity of rule between the different districts, but no uniformity of rule in the same district. No doubt there was an uniformity in the decisions of the same judge; but as the same judges seldom sat twice successively in the same district, and sometimes not till after an interval of two or three years, his opinions were forgotten or reversed before he returned. The judges were not educated in the same school. The practice of the courts, the forms of proceeding, as well as the rules of property, are extremely various in the different quarters of the United States. The lawyers of the Eastern, the Middle, and Southern States, are scarcely professors of the same science. These courts were in a state of perpetual fluctuation. The successive terms gave you courts in the same district, as different from each other as those of Connecticut and Virginia. No system of practice could grow up, no certainty of rule could be established. The seeds sown in one term scarcely vegetated before they were trodden under foot.

The condition of a suitor was terrible; the ground was always trembling under his feet. The opinion of a former judge was no precedent to his successor. Each considered himself bound to follow the light of his own understanding. To exemplify these remarks, I will take the liberty of stating a case which came under my own observation. An application before one judge was made to quash an attachment in favor of a subsequent execution creditor; the application was resisted upon two grounds, and the learned judge, to whom the application was first made, expressing his opinion in support of both grounds, dismissed the motion. At the succeeding court, a different judge presided, and the application was renewed and answered upon the same grounds. The second learned judge was of opinion, that one point has no validity, but he considered the other sustainable, and was about also to dismiss the motion, but upon being pressed, at last consented to grant a rule to show cause. At the third term, a third learned judge was on the bench, and though the case was urged upon its former principles, he was of opinion, that both answers to the application were clearly insufficient, and accordingly quashed the attachment. When the opinions of his predecessors were cited, he replied, that every man was to be saved by his own faith.

Upon the opinion of one judge, a suitor would set out in a long course of proceedings, and after losing much time and wasting much money, he would be met by another judge, who would tell him he had mistaken his road, that he must return to the place from which he started, and pursue a different track. Thus it happened as to the chancery process to compel the appearance of a defendant. Some of the judges considered themselves bound by the rules in the English books, while others conceived that a power belonged to the court, upon the service of a subpoena, to make a short rule for the defendant to appear and answer, or that the bill should be taken pro confesso. A case of this kind occurred where much embarrassment was experienced. In the circuit court for the district of Pennsylvania, a bill in chancery was filed against a person, who then happened to be in that district, but whose place of residence was in the Northwestern Territory. The subpoena was served, but there was no answer nor appearance. The court to which the writ was returned, without difficulty, upon an application, granted a rule for the party to appear and answer at the expiration of a limited time, or that the bill be taken pro confesso. A personal service of this rule being necessary, the complainant was obliged to hire a messenger to travel more than a thousand miles to serve a copy of the rule. At the ensuing court, affidavit was made of the service, and a motion to make the rule absolute. The scene immediately changed, a new judge presided, and it was no longer the same court.

The authority was called for to grant such a rule. Was it warranted by any act of Congress, or by the practice of the State? It was answered there is no act of Congress—the State has no court of chancery. But this proceeding was instituted, and has been brought to its present stage at considerable expense, under the direction of this court. The judge knew of no power the court had to direct the proceeding, and he did not consider that the complainant could have a decree upon his bill without going through the long train of process found in the books of chancery practice. The complainant took this course, and at a future time was told by another judge, that he was incurring an unnecessary loss of time and money, and that a common rule would answer his purpose. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, if any system could be devised more likely to produce vexation and delay? Surely, sir, the law is uncertain enough in itself, and its paths sufficiently intricate and tedious not to require that your suitors should be burdened with additional embarrassments by the organization of your courts.

The circuit is the principal court of civil and criminal business; the defects of this court were, therefore, most generally and sensibly felt. The high characters of the judges at first brought suitors into the courts; but the business was gradually declining, though causes belonging to the jurisdiction of the courts were multiplying, the continual oscillation of the court baffled all conjecture as to the correct course of the proceeding or the event of a cause. The law ceased to be a science. To advise your client it was less important to be skilled in the books than to be acquainted with the character of the judge who was to preside. When the term approached, the inquiry was, what judge are we to have? What is his character as a lawyer? Is he acquainted with chancery law? Is he a strict common lawyer, or a special pleader?

When the character of the judge was ascertained, gentlemen would then consider the nature of their causes, determine whether it was more advisable to use means to postpone or to bring them to a hearing.

The talents of the judges rather increased the evil, than afforded a corrective for the vicious constitution of these courts. They had not drawn their knowledge from the same sources. Their systems were different, and hence the character of the court more essentially changed at each successive term. These difficulties and embarrassments banished suitors from the court, and without more than a common motive, recourse was seldom had to the Federal tribunals.

I have ever considered it, also, as a defect in this court, that it was composed of judges of the highest and lowest grades. This, sir, was an unnatural association; the members of the court stood on ground too unequal to allow the firm assertion of his opinion to the district judge. Instead of being elevated, he felt himself degraded by a seat upon the bench of this court. In the district court he was everything, in the circuit court he was nothing. Sometimes he was obliged to leave his seat, while his associate reviewed the judgment which he had given in the court below. In all cases he was sensible that the sentences in the court in which he was, were subject to the revision and control of a superior jurisdiction where he had no influence, but the authority of which was shared by the judge with whom he was acting. No doubt in some instances the district judge was an efficient member of this court, but this never arose from the nature of the system, but from the personal character of the man. I have yet, Mr. Chairman, another fault to find with the ancient establishment of the circuit courts. They consisted only of two judges, and sometimes of one. The number was too small, considering the extent and importance of the jurisdiction of the court. Will you remember, sir, that they held the power of life and death, without appeal? That their judgments were final over sums of two thousand dollars, and their original jurisdiction restrained by no limits of value, and that this was the court to which appeals were carried from the district court.

I have often heard, sir, that in a multitude of counsel there was wisdom, and if the converse of the maxim be equally true, this court must have been very deficient. When we saw a single judge reversing the judgment of the district court, the objection was most striking, but the court never had the weight which it ought to have possessed, and would have enjoyed had it been composed of more members. But two judges belonged to the court, and inconvenience was sometimes felt from a division of their opinions. And this inconvenience was but poorly obviated by the provision of the law that in such cases the cause should be continued to the succeeding term, and receive its decision from the opinion of the judge who should then preside.

I do not pretend, Mr. Chairman, to have enumerated all the defects which belonged to the former judicial system. But I trust those which I have pointed out, in the minds of candid men, will justify the attempt of the Legislature to revise that system, and to make a fairer experiment of that part of the plan of our Constitution which regards the judicial power. The defects, sir, to which I have alluded, had been a long time felt and often spoken of. Remedies had frequently been proposed. I have known the subject brought forward in Congress or agitated in private, ever since I have had the honor of a seat upon this floor. I believe, sir, a great and just deference for the author of the ancient scheme prevented any innovation upon its material principles; there was no gentleman who felt that deference more than myself, nor should I have ever hazarded a change upon speculative opinion. But practice had discovered defects which might well escape the most discerning mind in planning the theory. The original system could not be more than experiment; it was built upon no experience. It was the first application of principles to a new state of things. The first judicial law displays great ability, and it is no disparagement of the author to say its plan is not perfect.

I know, sir, that some have said, and perhaps not a few have believed, that the new system was introduced not so much with a view to its improvement of the old, as to the places which it provided for the friends of the Administration.

H. OF R.

Judiciary System.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

This is a calumny so notoriously false, and so humble, as not to require nor to deserve an answer upon this floor. It cannot be supposed that the paltry object of providing for sixteen unknown men could have ever offered an inducement to a great party basely to violate their duty, meanly to sacrifice their character, and foolishly to forego all future hopes.

I now come, Mr. Chairman, to examine the changes which were made by the late law. This subject has not been correctly understood. It has everywhere been erroneously represented. I have heard much said about the additional courts created by the act of last session. I perceive them spoken of in the President's Message. In the face of this high authority, I undertake to state, that no additional court was established by that law. Under the former system there was one Supreme Court, and there is but one now. There were seventeen district courts, and there are no more now. There was a circuit court held in each district, and such is the case at present. Some of the district judges are directed to hold their courts at new places, but there is still in each district but one district court. What, sir, has been done? The unnatural alliance between the supreme and district courts has been severed, but the jurisdiction of both these courts remains untouched. The power or authority of neither of them has been augmented or diminished. The jurisdiction of the circuit court has been extended to the cognizance of debts of four hundred dollars, and this is the only material change in the power of that court. The chief operation of the late law is a new organization of the circuit courts. To avoid the evils of the former plan, it became necessary to create a new corps of judges. It was considered that the Supreme Court ought to be stationary, and to have no connexion with the judges over whose sentences they had an appellate jurisdiction.

To have formed a circuit court out of the district judges, would have allowed no court of appeal from the district court, except the Supreme Court, which would have been attended with great inconvenience. But this scheme was opposed by a still greater difficulty. In many districts the duties of the judge require a daily attention. In all of them business of great importance may on unexpected occurrences require his presence.

This plan was thought of; it was well-examined and finally rejected, in consequence of strong objections to which it was liable. Nothing therefore remained but to compose the circuit court of judges distinct from those of the other courts. Admitting the propriety of excluding from this court the judges of the supreme and district courts, I think the late Congress cannot be accused of any wanton expense, nor even of a neglect of economy in the new establishment. This extensive country has been divided into six circuits, and three judges appointed for each circuit. Most of the judges have twice a year to attend a court in three States, and there is not one of them who has not to travel further, and who in time will not have more labor to perform than any judge of the State courts. When we call to mind that the jurisdiction of this court reaches the life of the citizen, and that in civil cases its judgments are final to a large amount, certainly it will not be said that it ought to have been composed of less than three judges. One was surely not enough, and if it had been doubtful whether two were not sufficient, the inconvenience which would have frequently arisen from an equal division of opinion, justifies the provision which secures a determination in all cases.

It was, additionally, very material to place on the bench of this court a judge from each State, as the court was in general bound to conform to the law and the practice of the several States.

I trust, sir, the Committee are satisfied that the number of judges which compose the circuit court is not too great, and that the Legislature would have been extremely culpable to have committed the high powers of this court to fewer hands. Let me now ask, if the compensation allowed to these judges is extravagant? It is little more than half the allowance made to the judges of the Supreme Court. It is but a small proportion of the ordinary practice of those gentlemen of the bar, who are fit, and to whom we ought to look to fill the places. You have given a salary of two thousand dollars. The puisne judges of Pennsylvania, I believe, have more. When you deduct the expenses of the office, you will leave but a moderate compensation for service, but a scanty provision for a family. When, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen coolly consider the amendments of the late law, I flatter myself their candor will at least admit that the present modification was fairly designed to meet and remedy the evils of the old system.

The Supreme Court has been rendered stationary. Men of age, of learning, and of experience, are now capable of holding a seat on the bench; they have time to mature their opinions in causes on which they are called to decide, and they have leisure to devote to their books, and to augment their store of knowledge. It was our hope, by the present establishment of the court, to render it the future pride, and honor, and safety of the nation. It is this tribunal which must stamp abroad the judicial character of our country. It is here that ambassadors and foreign agents resort for justice; and it belongs to this high court to decide finally, not only on controversies of unlimited value between individuals, and on the more important collision of State pretensions, but also upon the validity of the laws of the States, and of this Government. Will it be contended that such great trusts ought to be reposed in feeble or incapable hands? It has been asserted that this court will not have business to employ it. The assertion is supported neither by what is past, nor by what is likely to happen. During the present session of Congress, at their last term, the court was fully employed for two weeks in the daily hearing of causes. But its business must increase. There is no longer that restraint upon appeals from the circuit court, which was imposed by the authority of the judge of the court to which the appeal was to be carried; no longer will the apprehension of a secret unavoidable bias in favor of the decision of a member of their own body, shake the confidence of a suitor, in resorting to this court, who thinks that justice has not been done to him in the court below. The progressive increase of the wealth and population of the country, will unavoidably swell the business of the court. But there is a more certain and unfailing source of employment, which will arise in the appeals from the courts of the National Territory. From the courts of original cognizance in this Territory, it affords the only appellate jurisdiction. If gentlemen will look to the state of property of a vast amount in this city, they must be satisfied that the Supreme Court will have enough to do for the money which is paid them.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

Let us next consider, sir, the present state of the circuit courts.

There are six courts, which sit in twenty-two districts, each court visits at least three districts, some four. The courts are now composed of three judges of equal power and dignity. Standing on equal ground, their opinions will be independent and firm. Their number is the best for consultation, and they are exempt from the inconvenience of an equal division of opinion. But what I value most, and what was designed to remedy the great defect of the former system, is the identity which the court maintains. Each district has now always the same court. Each district will hereafter have a system of practice and uniformity of decision. The judges of each circuit will now study, and learn, and retain the laws and practice of their respective districts. It never was intended, nor is it practicable, that the same rule of property or of proceeding should prevail from New Hampshire to Georgia. The old courts were enjoined to obey the laws of the respective States. Those laws fluctuate with the will of the State Legislatures, and no other uniformity could ever be expected, but in the construction of the Constitution and statutes of the United States. This uniformity is still preserved by the control of the Supreme court over the courts of the circuits. Under the present establishment, a rational system of jurisprudence will arise. The practice and local laws of the different districts may vary, but in the same district they will be uniform. The practice of each district will suggest improvements to the others, the progressive adoption of which will in time assimilate the systems of the several districts.

It is unnecessary, Mr. Chairman, for me to say anything in relation to the district courts. Their former jurisdiction was not varied by the law of the last session.

It has been my endeavor, sir, to give a correct idea of the defects of the former judicial plan, and of the remedies for those defects introduced by the law now designed to be repealed. I do not pretend to say that the present system is perfect; I contend only that it is better than the old. If, sir, instead of destroying, gentlemen will undertake to improve the present plan, I will not only applaud their motives, but will assist in their labor. We ask only that our system may be tried. Let the sentence of experience be pronounced upon it. Let us hear the national voice after it has been felt. They will then be better able to judge its merits. In practice it has not yet been complained of; and as it is designed for the benefit of the people, how can their friends justify the act of taking it from them before they have manifested their disposition to part with it?

How, sir, am I to account for the extreme anxiety to get rid of this establishment? Does it proceed from that spirit which, since power has been given to it, has so unrelentingly persecuted men in office who belonged to a certain sect? I hope there will be a little patience; these judges are old and infirm men; they will die; they must die: wait but a short time, their places will be vacant; they will be filled with the disciples of the new school, and gentlemen will not have to answer for the political murder which is now meditated.

I shall take the liberty now, sir, of paying some attention to the objections which have been expressed against the late establishment. An early exception, which, in the course of the debate, has been abandoned by most gentlemen, and little relied on by any one, is the additional expense. The gentleman from Virginia stated the expense of the present establishment at one hundred and thirty-seven thousand dollars. On this head the material question is, not what is the expense of the whole establishment, but what will be saved by the repealing law on the table. I do not estimate the saving at more than twenty-eight thousand five hundred dollars. You save nothing but the salaries of sixteen judges, of two thousand dollars each. From this amount is to be deducted the salary of a Judge of the Supreme Court which is three thousand five hundred dollars. Abolishing the present system will not vary the incidental expenses of the circuit court. You receive a circuit court whose incidental expenses will be equal to those of the court you destroy. The increased salaries of the district judges of Kentucky and Tennessee must remain. It is not proposed to abolish their offices, and the admissions upon the other side allow that the salaries cannot be reduced.

If there were no other objection, the present bill could not pass without amendment, because it reduces the salaries of those judges, which is a plain, undeniable infraction of the Constitution. But, sir, it is not a fair way of treating the subject to speak of the aggregate expense. The great inquiry is, whether the judges are necessary, and whether the salaries allowed to them are reasonable? Admitting the utility of the judges, I think no gentlemen will contend that the compensation is extravagant.

We are told of the expense attending the Federal Judiciary. Can gentlemen tell me of a Government under which justice is more cheaply administered? Add together the salaries of all your judges, and the amount but little exceeds the emoluments of the Chancellor of England. Ascertain the expenses of State justice, and the proportion of each State of the expense of federal justice, and you will find that the former is five times greater than the latter. Do gentlemen expect that a system expanded over the whole Union is to cost no more than the establishment of a single State? Let it be remembered, sir, that the Judiciary is an integral and co-ordinate part with the highest branches of the Government. No Government can long exist without an efficient Judiciary. It is the Judiciary which applies the law and enables the Executive to carry it into effect. Leave your laws to the judiciaries of the States to execute, and my word for it in ten years you have neither law nor Constitution. Is your Judiciary so costly that you will not support it? Why then lay out so much money upon the other branches of your Government? I beg that it will be recollected that if your Judiciary costs you thousands of dollars, your Legislature costs you hundreds of thousands, and your Executive millions.

An objection has been derived from the paucity of causes in the federal courts, and the objection has been magnified by the allegation, that the number had been annually decreasing. The facts admitted, I draw a very different inference from my opponents. In my opinion they furnish the strongest proof of the defects of the former establishment, and of the necessity of a reform. I have no doubt, nay, I know it to be the fact, that many suitors were diverted from those tribunals by the fluctuations to which they were subject. Allow me, however, to take some notice of the facts. They are founded upon the Presidential document No. 8. Taking the facts as there stated, they allow upwards of fifty suits annually for each court. When it is considered that those causes must each have exceeded the value of five hundred dollars, and that they were generally litigated cases, I do not conceive that there is much ground to affirm that the courts were without business. But, sir, I must be excused for saying, I pay little respect to this document. It has been shown by others in several points to be erroneous, and from my own knowledge, I know it to be incorrect. What right had the President to call upon the clerks to furnish him with the list of the suits which had been brought, or were depending in their respective courts? Had this been directed by Congress, or was there any money appropriated to pay the expense? Is there any law which made it the duty of the clerks to obey the order of the Executive? Are the clerks responsible for refusing the lists, or for making false or defective returns? Do we know anything about the authenticity of the certificates made by the clerks? And are we not now aiming a mortal blow at one branch of the Government, upon the credit, and at the instigation of another and a rival department? Yes, sir, I say, at the instigation of the President, for I consider this business wholly as a Presidential measure. This document and his Message, show that it originated with him; I consider it as now prosecuted by him, and I believe that he has the power to arrest its progress, or to accomplish its completion. I repeat that it is his measure. I hold him responsible for it; and I trust in God that the time may come, when he will be called upon to answer for it as his act. And I trust the time will arrive, when he will hear us speaking upon the subject more effectually.

It has been stated as the reproach, sir, of the bill of the last session, that it was made by a party at the moment when they were sensible that their power was expiring and passing into other hands. It is enough for me, that the full and legitimate power existed. The remnant was plenary and efficient. And it was our duty to employ it according to our judgment and conscience for the good of the country. We thought the bill a salutary measure, and there was no obligation upon us to leave it as a work for our successors. Nay, sir, I have no hesitation in avowing, that I had no confidence in the persons who were to follow us. And I was the more anxious while we had the means to accomplish a work which I believed they would not do, and which I sincerely thought would contribute to the safety of the nation, by giving strength and support to the Constitution through the storm to which it was likely to be exposed. The fears, which I then felt, have not been dispelled, but multiplied by what I have since seen. I know nothing which is to be allowed to stand. I observe the institutions of the Government falling around me, and where the work of destruction is to end God alone knows. We discharged our consciences in establishing a judicial system, which now exists, and it will be for those who now hold the power of the Government to answer for the abolition of it, which they at present meditate. We are told, that our law was against the sense of the nation. Let me tell those gentlemen, they are deceived, when they call themselves the nation. They are only a dominant party, and though the sun of Federalism should never rise again, they will shortly find men better or worse than themselves thrusting them out of their places. I know it is the cant of those in power, however they have acquired it, to call themselves the nation. We have recently witnessed an example of it abroad. How rapidly did the nation change in France? At one time Brissot called himself the nation; then Robespierre, afterwards Tallien and Barras, and finally Bonaparte. But their dreams were soon dissipated, and they awoke in succession upon the scaffold, or in banishment. Let not those gentlemen flatter themselves, that Heaven has reserved to them a peculiar destiny. What has happened to others in this country, they must be liable to. Let them not exult too highly in the enjoyment of a little brief and fleeting authority. It was ours yesterday, it is theirs to day, but to-morrow it may belong to others.

[Mr. BAYARD here stated, that he had gone through the remarks he had to make connected with the first point of the debate; that he observed, that the common hour of adjournment had gone by, and that he should sit down in order to allow the Committee to rise, if they thought proper; and that he should beg leave to be heard the following day upon the second point. After some conversation, the Committee rose, reported—and the House adjourned.]

SATURDAY, February 20.

A memorial of sundry inhabitants of the city and county of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, was presented to the House and read, praying a repeal of the act of Congress, passed on the thirteenth of February, one thousand eight hundred and one, entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the Courts of the United States."—Referred.

Mr. STANLEY, one of the members from the State of North Carolina, presented to the House certain resolutions agreed to by the two branches of the Legislature of the said State, on the fifteenth of December last, proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, respecting a choice of a President and Vice President, and the election of Representatives to Congress from the several States; which were received, read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. BAYARD.—I owe to the Committee the expression of my thanks for the patience with which they attended to the laborious discussion of yesterday.

It will be my endeavor, in the remarks which I have to offer upon the remaining part of the debate, to consume no time which the importance of the subject does not justify. I have never departed from the question before the Committee, but with great reluctance. Before I heard the gentleman from Virginia, I had not an observation to make unconnected with the bill on the table. It was he who forced me to wander on foreign ground; and be assured, sir, I shall be guilty of no new digressions where I am not covered by the same justification.

I did think that this was an occasion when the House ought to have been liberated from the dominion of party spirit, and allowed to decide upon the unbiassed dictates of their understanding. The vain hope which I indulged that this course would be pursued was soon dissipated by the inflammatory appeal made, by the gentleman from Virginia, to the passions of his party. This appeal (which treated with no respect the feelings of one side of the House) will excuse recriminations which have been made, or which shall be retorted. We were disposed to conciliate, but gentlemen are deceived if they think that we will submit to be trampled on.

I shall now, sir, proceed to the consideration of the second point which the subject presents. However this point may be disguised by subtleties, I conceive the true question to be, Has the Legislature a right, by a law, to remove a judge? Gentlemen may state their question to be, Has the Legislature a right by law to vacate the office of a judge? But, as in fact they remove the judges, they are bound to answer our question.

The question which I state they will not meet.

Nay, I have considered it as conceded, upon all hands, that the Legislature have not the power of removing a judge from his office; but it is contended only that the office may be taken from the judge. Sir, it is a principle in law, which ought, and I apprehend does, hold more strongly in politics, that what is prohibited from being done directly, is restrained from being done indirectly. Is there any difference, but in words, between taking the office from a judge and removing a judge from the office? Do you not indirectly accomplish the end which you admit is prohibited? I will not say that it is the sole intention of the supporters of the bill before us to remove the circuit judges from their offices, but I will say that they establish a precedent which will enable worse men than themselves to make use of the Legislative power, for that purpose, upon any occasion. If it be Constitutional to vacate the office, and in that way to dismiss the judge, can there be a question as to the power to re-create the office and fill it with another man? Repeal to-day the bill of the last session, and the circuit judges are no longer in office. To-morrow, rescind this repealing act, (and no one will doubt the right to do it,) and no effect is produced but the removal of the judges. To suppose that such a case may occur, is no vagary of imagination. The thing has been done, shamelessly done, in a neighboring State. The judges there held their offices upon the same tenure with the judges of the United States. Three of them were obnoxious to the men in power. The Judicial law of the State was repealed, and immediately re-enacted, without a veil being thrown over the transaction. The obnoxious men were removed, their places supplied with new characters, and the other judges were re-appointed. Whatever sophistry may be able to show in theory, in practice there never will be found a difference in the exercise of the powers of removing a judge and of vacating his office.

The question which we are now considering depends upon the provisions contained in the Constitution. It is an error of the Committee, upon plain subjects, to search for reasons very profound. Upon the present subject, the strong provisions of the Constitution are so obvious that no eye can overlook them. They have been repeatedly cited, and, as long as the question stated is under discussion, they must be reiterated. There are two prominent provisions to which I now particularly allude: first, the judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour; secondly, their compensation shall not be diminished during their continuance. These are provisions so clearly understood, upon the first impression, that their meaning is rather obscured than illustrated by argument. What is meant, and what has been universally understood, by the tenure of "good behaviour?" A tenure for life, if the judge commit no misdemeanor. It is so understood and expressed in England, and so it has always been received and admitted in this country. The express provision, then, of the Constitution, defines the tenure of a judge's office—a tenure during life. How is that tenure expressly qualified? By the good behaviour of the judge. Is the tenure qualified by any other express condition or limitation? No other. As the tenure is express—as but one express limitation is imposed upon it—can it be subject to any other limitation not derived from necessary implication? If any material provision in the Constitution can in no other manner be satisfied than by subjecting the tenure of this office to some new condition, I will then admit that the tenure is subject to the condition.

H. OF R.

Judiciary System.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Gentlemen have ventured to point out a provision which they conceived furnished this necessary implication. They refer to the power given to Congress, from time to time, to establish courts inferior to the Supreme Court. If this power cannot be exercised without vacating the offices of existing judges, I will concede that those offices may be vacated. But, on this head, there can be no controversy. The power has been, and at all times may be, exercised, without vacating the office of any judge. It was so exercised at the last session of Congress, and I surely do not now dispute the right of gentlemen to establish as many new courts as they may deem expedient. The power to establish new courts does not, therefore, imply a power to abolish the offices of existing judges, because the existence of those offices does not prevent an execution of the power.

The clause in the Constitution to which I have just alluded has furnished to gentlemen their famous position, that, though you cannot remove a judge from his office, you may take the office from the judge. Though I should be in order, I will not call this a quibble; but I shall attempt, in the course of the argument, yet more clearly to prove that it is one. I do not contend that you cannot abolish an empty office; but the point on which I rely, is, that you can do no act which impairs the independence of a judge. When gentlemen assert that the office may be vacated, notwithstanding the incumbency of the judge, do they consider that they beg the very point which is in controversy? The office cannot be vacated without violating the express provision of the Constitution in relation to the tenure.

The judge is to hold the office during good behaviour. Does he hold it when it is taken from him? Has the Constitution said that he shall hold the office during good behaviour, unless Congress shall deem it expedient to abolish the office? If this limitation has been omitted, what authority have we to make it part of the Constitution?

The second plain, unequivocal provision on this subject is, that the compensation of the judge shall not be diminished during the time he continues in office. This provision is directly levelled at the power of the Legislature. They alone could reduce the salary. Could this provision have any other design than to place the judge out of the power of Congress? And yet how imperfect and how absurd the plan! You cannot reduce a part of the compensation, but you may extinguish the whole. What is the sum of this notable reasoning? You cannot remove a judge from office, but you may take the office from the judge. You cannot take the compensation from the judge, but you may separate the judge from the compensation.

If your Constitution cannot resist reasoning like this, then indeed is it waste paper.

I will here turn aside, in order to consider a variety of arguments drawn from different sources, on which gentlemen on the other side have placed a reliance. I know of no order in which they can be classed, and I shall, therefore, take them up as I meet with them on my notes. It was urged by the honorable member from Virginia, to whom I have so frequently referred, that what was created by law might by law be annihilated. In the application of his principle, he disclosed views which I believe have not been contemplated by gentlemen of his party. He was industrious to show that not only the inferior courts, but the Supreme Court derives its existence from law. The President and Legislature exist under the Constitution. They came into being without the aid of a law. But, though the Constitution said there should be a Supreme Court, no judges could exist till the court was organized by a law. This argument, I presume, was pushed to this extent in order to give notice to the judges of the Supreme Court of their fate, and to bid them to prepare for their end.

I shall not attempt to discriminate between the tenure of the offices of the judges of the supreme and inferior courts. Congress has power to organize both descriptions of courts, and to limit the number of judges, but they have no power to limit or define the tenure of office. Congress creates the office, the President appoints the officer; but it is neither under Congress nor the President, but under the Constitution, that the judge claims to hold the office during good behaviour. The principle asserted does not in this case apply; the tenure of office is not created by law, and if the truth of the principle were admitted, it would not follow that the tenure of the office might be vacated by law. But the principle is not sound. I will show a variety of cases which will prove its fallacy. Among the obnoxious measures of the late Administration, was the loan of five millions, which was funded at eight per cent. The loan was created by a law and funded by law. Is the gentleman prepared to say that this debt, which was funded by a law of the former Legislature, may be extinguished by a law of the present? Can you, by calling the interest of this debt exorbitant and usurious, justify the reduction of it? Gentlemen admit that the salary of a judge, though established by a law, cannot be diminished by a law. The same thing must be allowed with respect to the salary of the President. Sir, the true principle is, that one Legislature may repeal the act of a former, in cases not prohibited by the Constitution. The correct question, therefore, is, whether the Legislature are not forbidden by the Constitution to abridge the tenure of a judicial office?

In order to avoid cases of a nature similar to those which I have put, the gentleman from Kentucky. (Mr. DAVIS,) and, after him, the gentleman from Virginia, endeavored to draw a dis-tion between laws executed and laws executory.

The distinction was illustrated by reference to the case of a State admitted by law into the Union. Here, it is said, the law is executed, and functus officio, and if you repeal it, still the State remains a member of the Union. But it was asked by the gentleman from Kentucky, supposing a law made to admit a State into the Union at a future time, before the time of admission arrived, could not the law be repealed? I will answer the question to the satisfaction of the gentleman, by stating a case which exists: By an ordinance of Congress, in the year 1787, Congress ordained, that when the population within the limits of a State within the Northwestern Territory should amount to sixty thousand souls, the district should be admitted as a member of the Union. Will the gentleman venture to doubt as to this case? Would he dare to tell the people of this country that Congress had the power to disfranchise them?

The law, in the case I refer to, is executory, though the event upon which it is to take effect is limited by population, and not by time.

But, sir, if there were anything in the principle, it has no influence upon the case to which it has been applied. A law has created the office of a judge, the judge has been appointed, and the office filled. The law is, therefore, executed, and upon the very distinction of the gentleman, cannot be repealed. The law fixing the compensation is executory, and so is that which establishes the salary of the President; but, though executory, they cannot be repealed. The distinction, therefore, is idle, and leaves the question upon the ground of the repeal being permitted or prohibited by the Constitution. I shall now advert, sir, to an argument urged with great force, and not a little triumph, by the honorable member from Virginia. This argument is derived from the word "hold," in the expression, the judge shall hold his office during good behaviour. It is considered as correlative to tenure. The gentleman remarks, that the Constitution provides that the President shall nominate the judge to his office, and when approved by the Senate, shall commission him. It is hence inferred that, as the President nominates and commissions the judge, the judge holds the office of the President; and that when the Constitution provides that the tenure of the office shall be during good behaviour, the provision applies to the President, and restrains the power which otherwise would result in consequence of the offices being holden of him, to remove the judges at his will. This is an argument, sir, which I should have thought that honorable member would have been the last person upon this floor to have adopted. It not only imputes to the President royal attributes, but prerogatives, derived from the rude doctrines of the feudal law.

Does the gentleman mean to contend that the President of these States, like the Monarch of England, is the fountain of honor, of justice, and of office? Does he mean to contend that the courts are the President's courts, and the judges the President's judges? Does he mean to say, sir, that the Chief Magistrate is always supposed to be present in these courts, and that the judges are but the images of his justice? To serve the paltry purposes of this argument, would the gentleman be willing to infuse in our Constitution the vital spirit of the feudal doctrines? He does not believe, he cannot believe, that when the word "hold" was employed, any reference was had to its feudal import. The language of the Constitution furnishes no support to this feudal argument. These officers are not called the judges of the President, but the judges of the United States. They are a branch of the Government equally important, and designed to be co-ordinate with the President. If, sir, because the President nominates to office and commissions, the office is held of him, for a stranger reason where by patent he grants lands of the United States, the lands are held of him. And upon the grantee's dying without heirs, the lands would escheat not to the United States, but to the President. In England, the tenure of lands and offices is derived from the same principle. All lands are held mediately or immediately of the Crown, because they are supposed to have been originally acquired from the personal grant of the Monarch. It is the same of office, as the King is supposed to be the source of all offices. Having the power to grant, he has a right to define the terms of the grant. These terms constitute the tenure. When the terms fail, the tenure ceases, and the object of the grant reverts to the grantor. This gentleman has charged others with monarchical tendencies, but never have I before witnessed an attempt so bold and strong to incorporate in our Constitution a rank monarchical principle. If, sir, the principle of our Constitution on this subject be republican and not monarchical, and the judges hold their offices of the United States, and not of the President, then the application of his argument has all the force against the gentleman which he designed it should have against his adversaries. For, if the office be held of the United States, and the tenure of good behaviour was designed to restrain the power of those of whom the office was holden, it will follow that it was the intention to restrain the power of the United States.

We have been told by gentlemen that the principles we advocated tended to establish a sincere system in the country. Sir, I am as little disposed to be accessory to the establishment of such a system as any gentleman on this floor. But let me ask how this system is to be produced? We established judicial offices, to which numerous and important duties were assigned. A compensation has been allowed to the judges, which no one will say is immoderate, or disproportioned to the service to be rendered. These gentlemen first abolish the duties of the offices, then call the judges pensioners, and afterwards accuse us of establishing sinecures. There are no pensioners at present; if there should be any, they will be the creatures of this law. I have ever considered it as a sound and moral maxim that no one should avail himself of his own wrong. It is a maxim which ought to be equally obligatory upon the public as upon the private man. In the present case, the judge offers you his service. You cannot say it is not worth the money you pay for it. You refuse to accept the service; and, after engaging to pay him while he continued to perform the service, you deny him his compensation, because he neglects to render services which you have prevented him from performing. Was injustice ever more flagrant? Surely, sir, the judges are innocent. If we did wrong, why should they be punished and disgraced? They did not pass the obnoxious law; they did not create the offices; they had no participation in the guilty business; but they were invited upon the faith of the Government to renounce their private professions, to relinquish the emoluments of other employments, and to enter into the service of the United States, who engaged to retain them during their lives, if they were guilty of no misconduct. They have behaved themselves well, unexceptionably well, when they find the Government rescinding the contract made with them, refusing the stipulated price of their labor, dismissing them from service, and in order to cover the scandalous breach of faith, stigmatizing them with names which may render them odious to their countrymen. Is there a gentleman on the floor of this House who would not revolt at such conduct in private life? Is there one who would feel himself justified, after employing a person for a certain time, and agreeing to pay a certain compensation, to dismiss the party from the service upon any caprice which altered his views, deny him the stipulated compensation, and to abuse him with opprobrious names for expecting the benefit of the engagement?

A bold attempt was made by one of the gentlemen from Virginia (Mr. GILES) to force to his aid the statute of William III. I call it a bold attempt, because the gentleman was obliged to rely upon his own assertion to support the ground of his argument. He stated that the clause in the Constitution was borrowed from a similar provision in the statute. I know nothing about the fact, but I will allow the gentleman its full benefit. In England, at an earlier period, the judges held their commissions during the good pleasure of the Monarch. The Parliament desired, and the King consented that the royal prerogative should be restrained. That the offices of judges should not depend on the will of the Crown alone, but upon the joint pleasure of the Crown and of Parliament. The King consented to part with a portion of his prerogative by relinquishing his power to remove the judges without the advice of his Parliament. By an express clause in the statute, he retained the authority to remove them with the advice of his Parliament. Suppose the clause had been omitted which reserved the right to remove upon the two Houses of Parliament, and the statute had been worded in the unqualified language of our Constitution, that the judges should hold their offices during good behaviour, would not the prerogative of removal have been abolished altogether? I will not say that the honorable member has been peculiarly unfortunate in the employment of this argument, because, sir, it appears to me that most to which he had recourse, when justly considered, have operated against the cause they were designed to support.

The gentleman tells us that the Constitutional provision on this subject was taken from the statute of William. Will he answer me this plain question? Why do we find omitted in the Constitution that part of the statutory provision, which allowed the judges to be removed upon the address of the two branches of the Legislature? Does he suppose that the clause was not observed? Does he imagine that the provision was dropt through inadvertency? Will he impute so gross a neglect to an instrument, every sentence, and word, and comma of which, he has told us was so maturely considered, and so warily settled? No, sir, it is impossible; and give me leave to say, that if this part of the Constitution were taken from the statute, (and the gentleman from Virginia must have better information on the subject than I have,) that a stronger argument could not be adduced to show that it was the intention of those who framed the Constitution, by omitting that clause in the statute which made the judges tenants of their office at the will of Parliament, to improve in this country the English plan of judicature, by rendering the judges independent of the Legislature. And I shall have occasion, in the course of my observations, to show that the strongest reasons derived from the nature of our Government, and which do not apply to the English form, require the improvement to be made.

Upon this point, sir, we may borrow a few additional rays of light from the constitutions of Pennsylvania, of Delaware, and of some other States. In those States, it has been thought that there might be misconduct on the part of a judge, not amounting to an impeachable offence, for which he should be liable to be removed. Their constitutions, therefore, have varied from that of the United States, and rendered their judges liable to be removed upon the address of two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature. Does it not strike every mind that it was the intention of those constitutions to have judges independent of a majority of each branch of the Legislature? And I apprehend, also, that it may be fairly inferred, that it was understood in those States when their constitutions were formed, that even two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature would not have the power to remove a judge, whose tenure of office was during good behaviour, unless the power was expressly given to them by the Constitution. I cannot well conceive of anything more absurd in an instrument designed to last for centuries, and to bind the furious passions of party, than to fortify one pass to judicial independence, and to leave another totally unguarded against the violence of Legislative power.

It has been urged by the gentleman from Virginia that our admission, that Congress has power to modify the office of a judge, leads to the conclusion, that they have the power to abolish the office; because, by paring away their powers, they may at length reduce them to a shadow, and leave them as humble and as contemptible as a court of pie-poudre. The office of a judge consists of judicial powers, which he is appointed to execute. Every law which is passed increases or diminishes those powers, and so far modifies the office; nay, it is competent for the Legislature to prescribe additional duties or to dispense with unnecessary services, which are connected with the office of judge. But this power has its bounds. You may modify the office to any extent which does not affect the independence of the judge. The judge is to hold the office during good behaviour; now modify as you please, so that you do not infringe this Constitutional provision.

Do you ask me to draw a line and say, thus far you shall go and no further? I admit no line can be drawn. It is an affair of sound and bona fide discretion, because a discretion on the subject is given to the Legislature; to argue upon the abuse of that discretion is adopting a principle subversive of all legitimate power.

The Constitution is predicated upon the existence of a certain degree of integrity in man. It has trusted powers liable to enormous abuse, if all political honesty be discarded. The Legislature is not limited in the amount of the taxes which they have a right to impose, nor as to the objects to which they are to be applied. Does this power give us the property of the country, because, by taxes, we might draw it into the public coffers, and then cut up the Treasury and divide the spoils? Is there any power in respect to which a precise line can be drawn between the discreet exercise and the abuse of it?

I can only say, therefore, on this subject, that every man is acquitted to his own conscience who bona fide does not intend, and who sincerely does not believe that, by the law which he is about to pass, he interferes with the judges holding their offices during good behaviour.

I am now brought, Mr. Chairman, to take notice of some remarks which fell from the gentleman from Virginia, which do not belong to the subject before us, but are of sufficient importance to deserve particular attention. He called our attention, in a very impressive manner, to the state of parties in this House at the time when the act of the last session passed. He describes us in a state of blind paroxysm, incapable of discerning the nature or tendency of the measures we were pursuing; that a majority of the House were struggling to counteract the expression of the public will, in relation to the person who was to be the Chief Magistrate of the country.

I did suppose, sir, that this subject was at an end; and I did imagine that as gentlemen had accomplished their object, they would have been satisfied. But as the subject is again renewed, we must be allowed to justify our conduct. I know not what the gentleman calls an expression of the public will. There were two candidates for the office of President, who were presented to the House of Representatives with equal suffrages. The Constitution gave us the right, and made it our duty to elect that one of the two whom we thought preferable. A public man is to notice the public will, as Constitutionally expressed. The gentleman from Virginia, and many others, may have had their preference, but that preference of the public will did not appear by its Constitutional expression. Sir, I am not certain that either of those candidates had a majority of the country in his favor. Excluding the State of South Carolina, the country was equally divided. We know that parties in that State were nearly equally balanced, and the claims of both the candidates were supported by no other scrutiny into the public will, than our official return of votes. Those votes are very imperfect evidence of the true will of a majority of the nation. They resulted from political intrigue and artificial arrangements.

When we look at the votes, we must suppose that every man in Virginia voted the same way. These votes are received as a correct expression of the public will. And yet we know that, if the votes of that State were apportioned according to the several voices of the people, that, at least, seven out of twenty-one would have been opposed to the successful candidates. It was the suppression of the will of one-third of Virginia which enables gentlemen now to say, that the present Chief Magistrate is the man of the people. I consider that as the public will, which is expressed by Constitutional organs. To that will I bow and submit. The public will, thus manifested, gave to the House of Representatives the choice of the two men for President. Neither of them was the man whom I wished to make President; but my election was confined, by the Constitution, to one of the two, and I gave my vote to the one whom I thought was the greater and better man. That vote I repeated, and in that vote I should have persisted, had I not been driven from it by imperious necessity. The prospect ceased of the vote being effectual, and the alternative only remained of taking one man for President, or having no President at all. I chose, as I then thought, the lesser evil.

From the scene in this House, the gentleman carried us to one in the Senate. I should blush, sir, for the honor of the country, could I suppose that the law designed to be repealed owed its support in that body to the motives which have been indicated. The charge designed to be conveyed, not only deeply implicates the integrity of individuals of the Senate, but of the person who was then the Chief Magistrate. The gentleman, going beyond all precedent, has mentioned the names of members of that body, to whom commissions issued for offices not created by the bill before them, but which that bill, by the promotions it afforded, was likely to render vacant. He has considered the scandal of the transaction as aggravated by the issuing of commissions for offices not actually vacant, upon the bare presumption that they would become vacant, by the incumbents accepting commissions for higher offices which were issued in their favor. The gentleman has particularly dwelt upon the indecent appearance of the business, from two commissions being held by different persons at the same time for the same office.

I beg that it will be understood, that I mean to give no opinion as to the regularity of granting a commission for a judicial office, upon the probability of a vacancy before it is actually vacant: but I shall be allowed to say, that so much doubt attends the point, that an innocent mistake might be made on the subject. I believe, sir, it has been the practice to consider the acceptance of an office as relating to the date of the commission. The officer is allowed his salary from that date, upon the principle that the commission is a grant of the office, and the title commences with the date of the grant. This principle is certainly liable to abuse, but where there was a suspicion of abuse, I presume the Government would depart from it. Admitting the office to pass by the commission, and the acceptance to relate to its date, it then does not appear very incorrect in the case of a commission for the office of a circuit judge, granted to a district judge, as the acceptance of the commission for the former office relates to the date of the commission, to consider the latter office as vacant from the same time. The offices are incompatible. You cannot suppose the same person in both offices at the same time. From the moment, therefore, that you consider the office of circuit judge filled by a person who holds the commission of district judge, you must consider the office of district judge as vacated. The grant is contingent. If the contingency happen, the office vests from the date of the commission; if the contingency does not happen, the grant is void. If this reasoning be sound, it was not irregular in the late Administration, after granting a commission to a district judge, for the place of a circuit judge, to make a grant of the office of the district judge, upon the contingency of his accepting the office of circuit judge.

I now, sir, return to that point of the charge which was personal in its nature, and of infinitely the most serious import. It is a charge, as to which we can only ask, is it true? If it be true, it cannot be excused; it cannot be palliated; it is vile, profligate corruption, which every honest mind will execrate. But, sir, we are not to condemn till we have evidence of the fact. If the offence be serious, the proof ought to be plenty. I will consider the evidence of the fact upon which the honorable member has relied, and I will show him, by the application of it to a stronger case, that it is of a nature to prove nothing.

Let me first state the principal case. Two gentlemen of the Senate, Mr. Read, of South Carolina, and Mr. Green, of Rhode Island, who voted in favor of the law of last session, each received an appointment to the place of district judge, which was designed to be vacated by the promotion of the district judge to the office of circuit judge. The gentleman conveyed to us a distinct impression of his opinion, that there was an understanding between these gentlemen and the President, and that the offices were the promised price of their votes.

I presume, sir, the gentleman will have more charity in the case which I am about to mention, and he will for once admit that public men ought not to be condemned upon loose conclusions, drawn from equivocal presumptions.

The case, sir, to which I refer, carries me once more to the scene of the Presidential election. I should not have introduced it into this debate, had it not been called up by the honorable member from Virginia. In that scene I had my part; it was a part not barren of incident, and which has left an impression which cannot easily depart from my recollection. I know who were rendered important characters, either from the possession of personal means, or from the accident of political situation. And now, sir, let me ask the honorable member what his reflections and belief will be, when he observes that every man, on whose vote the event of the election hung, has since been distinguished by Presidential favor? I fear, sir, I shall violate the decorum of Parliamentary proceeding, in the mentioning of names; but I hope the example which has been set me will be admitted as an excuse. Mr. Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, was not a member of the House, but he was one of the most active, efficient, and successful promoters of the election of the present Chief Magistrate. It was well ascertained that the votes of South Carolina were to turn the equal balance of the scales. The zeal and industry of Mr. Pinckney had no bounds. The doubtful politics of South Carolina were decided, and her votes cast into the scale of Mr. Jefferson. Mr. Pinckney has since been appointed Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of Madrid; an appointment as high and honorable as any within the gift of the Executive. I will not deny that this preferment is the reward of talents and services, although, sir, I have never yet heard of the talents or services of Mr. Charles Pinckney. In the House of Representatives I know what was the value of the vote of Mr. Claiborne, of Tennessee. The vote of a State was in his hands. Mr. Claiborne has since been raised to the high dignity of Governor of the Mississippi Territory. I know how great, and how greatly felt, was the importance of the vote of Mr. Linn, of New Jersey. The delegation of the State consists of five members. Two of the delegation were decidedly for Mr. Jefferson; two were decidedly for Mr. Burr. Mr. Linn was considered as inclining to one side, but still doubtful. Both parties looked up to him for the vote of New Jersey. He gave it to Mr. Jefferson, and Mr. Linn has since had the profitable office of supervisor of his district conferred upon him. Mr. Lyon, of Vermont, was, in this instance, an important man. He neutralized the vote of Vermont. His absence alone would have given the vote of a State to Mr. Burr. It was too much to give an office to Mr. Lyon; his character was low. But Mr. Lyon's son has been handsomely provided for in one of the Executive offices. I shall add to the catalogue but the name of one more gentleman, Mr. Edward Livingston, of New York. I knew well, full well I knew the consequence of this gentlemen. His means were not limited to his own vote; nay, I always considered more than the vote of New

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

York within his power. Mr. Livingston has been made the attorney for the district of New York; the road of preferment has been opened to him, and his brother has been raised to the distinguished place of Minister Plenipotentiary to the French Republic.

This catalogue might be swelled to a much greater magnitude; but I fear, Mr. Chairman, were I to proceed farther, it might be supposed that I myself harbored the uncharitable suspicions of the integrity of the Chief Magistrate, and of the purity of the gentlemen whom he thought proper to promote, which it is my design alone to banish from the mind of the honorable member from Virginia. It would be doing me great injustice to suppose that I have the smallest desire, or have had the remotest intention to tarnish the fame of the present Chief Magistrate, or of any of the honorable gentlemen who have been the objects of his favor, by the statement which I have made; my motive is of an opposite nature. The late President appointed gentlemen to office to whom he owed no personal obligations, but who only supported what has been considered as a favorite measure. This has been assumed as a sufficient ground, not only of suspicion, but of condemnation. The present Executive, leaving scarcely an exception, has appointed to office, or has, by accident, indirectly gratified every man who had any distinguished means in the competition for the Presidential office, of deciding the election in his favor. Yet, sir, all this furnishes too feeble a presumption to warrant me to express a suspicion of the integrity of a great officer, or of the probity of honorable men, in the discharge of the high functions which they have derived from the confidence of their country. I am sure, sir, in this case, the honorable member from Virginia is as exempt from any suspicion as myself. And I shall have accomplished my whole object, if I induce that honorable member, and other members of the Committee, who entertain his suspicions as to the conduct of the late Executive, to review the ground of those suspicions, and to consider that in a case furnishing much stronger ground for the presumption of criminality, they have an unshaken belief, an unbroken confidence in the purity and fairness of the Executive conduct.

I return again to the subject before the Committee, from the unpleasant digression to which I was forced to submit, in order to repel insinuations which were calculated to have the worst effect, as well abroad as within the walls of this House. I shall now cursorily advert to some arguments of minor importance, which are supposed to have some weight, by gentlemen on the other side. It is said, that if the courts are sanctuaries, and the judges cannot be removed by law, it would be in the power of a party to create a host of them to live as pensioners on the country. This argument is predicated upon an extreme abuse of power, which can never fairly be urged to restrain the legitimate exercise of it: as well might it be urged that a subsequent Congress had a right to reduce the salary of a judge, or of the President, fixed by a former Congress; because, if the right did not exist, one Congress might confer a salary of five hundred thousand or one million dollars, to the impoverishment of the country. It will be time enough to decide upon those extreme cases when they occur. We are told that the doctrine we contend for, enables one Legislature to derogate from the power of another. That it attributes to a former, a power which it denies to a subsequent Legislature.

This is not correct. We admit that this Congress possesses all the power possessed by the last Congress. That Congress had a power to establish courts; so has the present. That Congress had not, nor did it claim the power to abolish the office of a judge while it was filled. Though they thought five judges under the new system sufficient to constitute the Supreme Court, they did not attempt to touch the office of either of the six judges. Though they considered it more convenient to have circuit judges in Kentucky and Tennessee than district judges, they did not lay their hands upon the offices of the six judges. We therefore deny no power to this Congress which was not denied to the last. An honorable member from Virginia seriously expressed his alarm, lest the principles we contended for should introduce into the country a privileged order of men. The idea of the gentleman supposes that every office not at will establishes a privileged order. The judges have their offices for one term; the President, the Senators, and the members of this House, for different terms. While these terms endure, there is a privilege to hold the places, and no power exists to remove. If this be what the gentleman means by a privileged order, and he agrees that the President, the Senators, and the members of this House, belong to privileged orders, I shall give myself no trouble to deny that the judges fall under the same description; and I believe that the gentleman will find it difficult to show, that in any other manner they are privileged. I did not suppose that this argument was so much addressed to the understandings of gentlemen upon this floor, as to the prejudices and passions of people out of doors.

It was urged with some impression by the honorable member from Virginia, to whom I last referred, that the position that the office of a judge might be taken from him by law, was not a new doctrine. That it was established by the very act now designed to be repealed, which was described in glowing language to have inflicted a gaping wound on the Constitution, and to have stained with its blood the pages of our statute book. It shall be my task, sir, to close this gaping wound, and to wash from the pages of our statute book the blood with which they are stained. It will be an easy task to show to you the Constitution without a wound, and the statute book without a stain.

It is, sir, the twenty-seventh section of the bill of the last session which the honorable member considers as having inflicted the ghastly wound on the Constitution, of which he has so feelingly spoken. That section abolishes the ancient circuit courts. But, sir, have we contended, or has the gentleman shown, that the Constitution prohibits the abolition of a court when you do not materially affect, or in any degree impair the independence of a judge? A court is nothing than a place where a judge is directed more to discharge certain duties. There is no doubt you may erect a new court and direct it to be holden by the judges of the Supreme or of the District Courts. And if it should afterwards be your pleasure to abolish that court, it cannot be said that you destroy the offices of the judges by whom it was appointed that the courts should be holden.

Thus it was directed by the original judicial law, that a circuit court should be holden at Yorktown in the district of Pennsylvania. This court was afterwards abolished, but it was never imagined that the office of any judge was affected. Let me suppose that a State is divided into two districts, and district courts established in each, but that one judge is appointed by law to discharge the judicial duties in both courts. The arrangement is afterwards found inconvenient, and one of the courts is abolished. In this case will it be said, that the office of the judge is destroyed, or his independence affected? The error into which gentlemen have fallen on this subject has arisen from their taking for granted what they have not attempted to prove, and what cannot be supported, that the office of a judge, and any court in which he officiates, are the same thing. It is most clear, that a judge may be authorized and directed to perform duties in several courts, and that the discharging him from the performance of duty in one of those courts cannot be deemed an infringement of his office. The case of the late circuit courts as plainly illustrates the argument, and as conclusively demonstrates its correctness, as any case which can be put. There were not nominally any judges of the circuit court. The court was directed to be holden by the judges of the supreme and of the district courts. The judges of these two courts were associated and directed to perform certain duties; when associated, and in the performance of those duties, they were denominated the circuit court. This court is abolished; the only consequence is, that the judges of the supreme and district courts are discharged from the performance of the joint duties which were previously imposed upon them. But is the office of one judge of the supreme or of the district courts infringed? Can any judge say, in consequence of the abolition of the circuit courts, I no longer hold my office during good behaviour? On this point, it was further alleged by the same honorable member, that the law of the last session inflicted another wound on the Constitution by abolishing the district courts of Kentucky and Tennessee. The gentleman was here deceived by the same fallacy which misled him on the subject of the circuit courts. If he will give himself the trouble of carefully reviewing the provisions of the law, he will discern the sedulous attention of the Legislature to avoid the infringement of the offices of those judges. I believe the gentleman went so far as to charge us with appointing by law those judges to new offices.

The law referred to, said Mr. B., establishes a circuit, comprehending Kentucky, Tennessee, and the district of Ohio. The duties of the court of this circuit are directed to be performed by a circuit judge and the two district judges of Kentucky and Tennessee. Surely it is competent for the Legislature to create a court, and to direct that it shall be holden by any of the existing judges. If the Legislature had done with respect to all the district judges what they have with respect to those of Kentucky and Tennessee, I am quite certain that the present objection would have appeared entirely groundless. Had they directed that all the circuit courts should be held by the respective judges within the circuits, gentlemen would have clearly seen that this was only an imposition of a new duty, and not an appointment to a new office.

It will be recollected, said Mr. B., that under the old establishment, the district judges of Kentucky and Tennessee were invested generally with the powers of the circuit judges. The ancient powers of those judges are scarcely varied by the late law, and the amount of the change is, that they are directed to exercise those powers in a court formerly called a district, but now a circuit court, and at other places than those to which they were formerly confined. But the district judge nominally remains; his office both nominally and substantially exists, and he holds it now as he did before, during good behaviour. I will refer gentlemen to different provisions in the late law, which will show beyond denial that the Legislature carefully and pointedly avoided the act of abolishing the offices of those judges.

The seventh section of the law provides that the court of the sixth circuit shall be composed of a circuit judge, "and the judges of the district courts of Kentucky and Tennessee." It is afterwards declared in the same section, "that there shall be appointed, in the sixth circuit, a judge of the United States, to be called a circuit judge, who, together with the district judges of Tennessee and Kentucky, shall hold the circuit courts hereby directed to be holden within the same circuit." And, finally, in the same section it is provided, "that whenever the office of district judge in the districts of Kentucky and Tennessee respectively shall become vacant, such vacancies shall respectively be supplied by the appointment of two additional circuit judges in the said circuit, who, together with the circuit judge first aforesaid, shall compose the circuit court of the said circuit." When the express language of the law affirms the existence of the office and of the officer, by providing for the contingency of the officer ceasing to fill the office, with what face can gentlemen contend that the office is abolished? They who are not satisfied upon this point I despair of convincing upon any other.

Upon the main question, said Mr. B., whether the judges hold their offices at the will of the Legislature, an argument of great weight, and, according to my humble judgment, of irresistible force, still remains. The Legislative power of the Government is not absolute, but limited. If it be doubtful whether the Legislature can do what the Constitution does not explicitly authorize; yet there can be no question that they cannot do what the Constitution expressly prohibits. To maintain, therefore, the Constitution, the judges are a check upon the Legislature. The doctrine I know is denied, and it is therefore incumbent upon me to show that it is sound.

It was once thought by gentlemen who now deny the principle, that the safety of the citizen and of the States rested upon the power of the judges to declare an unconstitutional law void. How vain is a paper restriction, if it confers neither power nor right! Of what importance is it to say, Congress are prohibited from doing certain acts, if no legitimate authority exists in the country to decide whether an act done is a prohibited act? Do gentlemen perceive the consequences which would follow from establishing the principle, that Congress have the exclusive right to decide upon their own powers? This principle admitted, does any Constitution remain? Does not the power of the Legislature become absolute and omnipotent? Can you talk to them of transgressing their powers when no one has a right to judge of those powers but themselves? They do what is not authorized, they do what is inhibited, nay, at every step they trample the Constitution under foot; yet their acts are lawful and binding, and it is treason to resist them. How ill, sir, do the doctrines and professions of these gentlemen agree! They tell us they are friendly to the existence of the States; that they are the friends of a federative, but the enemies of a consolidated, General Government, and yet, sir, to accomplish a paltry object, they are willing to settle a principle which, beyond all doubt, would eventually plant a consolidated Government, with unlimited power, upon the ruins of the State governments. Nothing can be more absurd than to contend that there is a practical restraint upon a political body who are answerable to none but themselves for the violation of the restraint, and who can derive from the very act of violation, undeniable justification of their conduct.

If, said Mr. B., you mean to have a Constitution, you must discover a power to which the acknowledged right is attached of pronouncing the invalidity of the acts of the Legislature which contravene the instrument. Does the power reside in the States? Has the Legislature of a State a right to declare an act of Congress void? This would be erring upon the opposite extreme. It would be placing the General Government at the feet of the State governments. It would be allowing one member of the Union to control all the rest. It would inevitably lead to civil dissension and a dissolution of the General Government. Will it be pretended that the State courts have the exclusive right of deciding upon the validity of our laws? I admit that they have the right to declare an act of Congress void. But this right they enjoy in practice, and it ever essentially must exist, subject to the revision and control of the courts of the United States. If the State courts definitively possessed the right of declaring the invalidity of the laws of this Government, it would bring us in subjection to the States. The judges of those courts, being bound by the laws of the State, if a State declared an act of Congress unconstitutional, the law of the State would oblige its courts to determine the law invalid. This principle would also destroy the uniformity of obligation upon all the States, which should attend every law of this Government. If a law were declared void in one State, it would exempt the citizens of that State from its operation, whilst obedience was yielded to it in the other States. I go further, and say, if the States or State courts had a final power of annulling the acts of this Government, its miserable and precarious existence would not be worth the trouble of a moment to preserve. It would endure but a short time, as a subject of derision, and, wasting into an empty shadow, would quickly vanish from our sight. Let me now ask if the power to decide upon the validity of our laws resides with the people? Gentlemen cannot deny this right to the people. I admit that they possess it. But if, at the same time, it does not belong to the courts of the United States, where does it lead the people? It leads them to the gallows. Let us suppose that Congress, forgetful of the limits of their authority, pass an unconstitutional law. They lay a direct tax upon one State and impose none upon the others. The people of the State taxed contest the validity of the law. They forcibly resist its execution. They are brought by the Executive authority before the courts upon charges of treason. The law is unconstitutional, the people have done right, but the court are bound by the law, and obliged to pronounce upon them the sentence which it inflicts. Deny to the courts of the United States the power of judging upon the constitutionality of our laws, and it is vain to talk of its existing elsewhere. The infractors of the laws are brought before these courts, and if the courts are implicitly bound, the invalidity of the laws can be no defence. There is, however, Mr. Chairman, still a stronger ground of argument upon this subject. I shall select one or two cases to illustrate it. Congress are prohibited from passing a bill of attainder; it is also declared in the Constitution, that "no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the party attainted." Let us suppose that Congress pass a bill of attainder, or they enact that any one attainted of treason shall forfeit to the use of the United States all the estate which he held in any lands or tenements. The party attainted is seized and brought before a federal court, and an award of execution passed against him. He opens the Constitution and points to this line, "no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed." The attorney for the United States reads the bill of attainder.

The court are bound to decide, but they have only the alternative of pronouncing the law or the Constitution invalid. It is left to them only to say that the law vacates the Constitution, or the Constitution avoids the law. So in the other case stated, the heir, after the death of his ancestor, brings his ejectment in one of the courts of the United States to recover his inheritance. The law by which it is confiscated is shown. The Constitution gave no power to pass such a law. On the contrary, it expressly denied it to the Government. The title of the heir is rested on the Constitution, the title of the Government on the law. The effect of one destroys the effect of the other; the court must determine which is effectual.

There are many other cases, Mr. Chairman, of a similar nature, to which I might allude. There is the case of the privilege of habeas corpus, which cannot be suspended but in times of rebellion or of invasion. Suppose a law prohibiting the issuing of the writ at a moment of profound peace. If in such case the writ were demanded of a court, could they say, it is true the Legislature were restrained from passing the law, suspending the privilege of this writ, at such a time as that which now exists, but their mighty power has broken the bonds of the Constitution, and fettered the authority of the court. I am not, sir, disposed to vaunt, but standing on this ground I throw the gauntlet to any champion upon the other side. I call upon them to maintain, that in a collision between a law and the Constitution, the judges are bound to support the law, and annul the Constitution. Can the gentlemen relieve themselves from this dilemma? Will they say, though a judge has no power to pronounce a law void, he has a power to declare the Constitution invalid.

The doctrine for which I am contending is not only clearly inferable from the plain language of the Constitution, but by law has been expressly declared and established in practice since the existence of the Government.

The second section of the third article of the Constitution expressly extends the judicial power to all cases arising under the Constitution, the laws, &c. The provision in the second clause of the sixth article leaves nothing to doubt. "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, &c. shall be the supreme law of the land." The Constitution is absolutely the supreme law. Not so the acts of the Legislature. Such only are the law of the land as are made in pursuance of the Constitution.

I beg the indulgence of the Committee one moment, while I read the following provision from the twenty-fifth section of the judicial act of the year seventeen hundred and eighty-nine:

"A final judgment or decree in any suit in the highest court of law or equity of a State in which a decision in the suit could be had, where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States, and the decision is against their validity, &c. may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon a writ of error."

Thus, as early as the year 1789, among the first acts of the Government, the Legislature explicitly recognised the right of a State court to declare a treaty, a statute, and authority exercised under the United States, void, subject to the revision of the Supreme Court of the United States; and it has expressly given the final power to the Supreme Court to affirm a judgment which is against the validity either of a treaty, statute, or an authority of the Government.

I humbly trust, Mr. Chairman, that I have given abundant proofs from the nature of our Government, from the language of the Constitution, and from Legislative acknowledgment, that the judges of our courts have the power to judge and determine upon the constitutionality of our laws.

Let me now suppose, that in our frame of government the judges are a check upon the Legislature; that the Constitution is deposited in their keeping. Will you say afterwards that their existence depends upon the Legislature? That the body whom they are to check has the power to destroy them? Will you say that the Constitution may be taken out of their hands, by a power the most to be distrusted, because the only power which could violate it with impunity? Can any thing be more absurd than to admit, that the judges are a check upon the Legislature, and yet to contend that they exist at the will of the Legislature? A check must necessarily imply a power commensurate to its end. The political body designed to check another must be independent of it, otherwise there can be no check. What check can there be when the power designed to be checked can annihilate the body which is to restrain it?

I go farther, Mr. Chairman, and take a still stronger ground. I say, in the nature of things, the dependence of the judges upon the Legislature, and their right to declare the acts of the Legislature void, are repugnant and cannot exist together. The doctrine, sir, supposes two rights—first, the right of the Legislature to destroy the office of the judge, and the right of the judge to vacate the act of the Legislature. You have a right to abolish, by a law, the offices of the judges of the circuit court; they have a right to declare the law void. It unavoidably follows, in the exercise of these rights, either that you destroy their rights, or that they destroy yours. This doctrine is not an harmless absurdity, it is a most dangerous heresy. It is a doctrine which cannot be practised without producing not discord only, but bloodshed. If you pass the bill upon your table the judges have a Constitutional right to declare it void. I hope they will have courage to exercise that right; and if, sir, I am called upon to take my side, standing acquitted in my conscience and before my God, of all motives but the support of the Constitution of my country, I shall not tremble at the consequences.

The Constitution may have its enemies, but I know that it has also its friends. I beg gentlemen to pause before they take this rash step. There are many, very many, who believe, if you strike this blow, you inflict a mortal wound on the Constitution. There are many now willing to spill their blood to defend that Constitution. Are gentle men disposed to risk the consequences? Sir, I mean no threats, I have no expectation of appalling the stout hearts of my adversaries; but if gentlemen are regardless of themselves, let them consider their wives and children, their neighbors and their friends. Will they risk civil dissension, will they hazard the welfare, will they jeopardize the peace of the country, to save a paltry sum of money—less than thirty thousand dollars?

Mr. Chairman, I am confident that the friends of this measure are not apprized of the nature of its operation, nor sensible of the mischievous consequences which are likely to attend it. Sir, the morals of your people, the peace of the country, the stability of the Government, rest upon the maintenance of the independence of the Judiciary. It is not of half the importance in England, that the judges should be independent of the Crown, as it is with us, that they should be independent of the Legislature. Am I asked, would you render the judges superior to the Legislature? I answer, no, but co-ordinate. Would you render them independent of the Legislature? I answer, yes, independent of every power on earth, while they behave themselves well. The essential interests, the permanent welfare of society, require this independence. Not, sir, on account of the judge—that is a small consideration, but on account of those between whom he is to decide. You calculate on the weaknesses of human nature, and you suffer the judge to be dependent on no one, lest he should be partial to those on whom he depends. Justice does not exist where partiality prevails. A dependent judge cannot be impartial. Independence is, therefore, essential to the purity of your Judicial tribunals.

Let it be remembered, that no power is so sensibly felt by society, as that of the Judiciary. The life and property of every man is liable to be in the hands of the judges. Is it not our great interest to place our judges upon such high ground, that no fear can intimidate, no hope can seduce them. The present measure humbles them in the dust, it prostrates them at the feet of faction, it renders them the tools of every dominant party. It is this effect which I deprecate, it is this consequence which I deeply deplore. What does reason, what does argument avail, when party spirit presides? Subject your bench to the influence of this spirit, and justice bids a final adieu to your tribunals. We are asked, sir, if the judges are to be independent of the people? The question presents a false and delusive view. We are all the people. We are, and as long as we enjoy our freedom, we shall be divided into parties. The true question is, Shall the Judiciary be permanent, or fluctuate with the tide of public opinion? I beg, I implore gentlemen to consider the magnitude and value of the principle which they are about to annihilate. If your judges are independent of political changes, they may have their preferences, but they will not enter into the spirit of party. But let their existence depend upon the support of the power of a certain set of men, and they cannot be impartial. Justice will be trodden under foot. Your courts will lose all public confidence and respect. The judges will be supported by their partisans, who in their turn will expect impunity for the wrongs and violence they commit. The spirit of party will be inflamed to madness; and the moment is not far off when this fair country is to be desolated by civil war.

Do not say, that you render the judges dependent only on the people. You make them dependent on your President. This is his measure. The same tide of public opinion which changes a President, will change the majorities in the branches of the Legislature. The Legislature will be the instrument of his ambition, and he will have the courts as the instrument of his vengeance. He uses the Legislature to remove the judges, that he may appoint creatures of his own. In effect, the powers of the Government will be concentrated in the hands of one man, who will dare to act with more boldness, because he will be sheltered from responsibility. The independence of the Judiciary was the felicity of our Constitution. It was this principle which was to curb the fury of party upon sudden changes. The first moments of power, gained by a struggle, are the most vindictive and intemperate. Raised above the storm, it was the Judiciary which was to control the fiery zeal, and to quell the fierce passions of a victorious faction.

We are standing on the brink of that revolutionary torrent, which deluged in blood one of the fairest countries of Europe.

France had her National Assembly, more numerous and equally popular with our own. She had her tribunals of justice, and her juries. But the Legislature and her courts were but the instruments of her destruction. Acts of proscription and sentences of banishment and death were passed in the cabinet of a tyrant. Prostrate your judges at the feet of party, and you break down the mounds which defend you from this torrent. I am done. I should have thanked my God for greater power to resist a measure so destructive to the peace and happiness of the country. My feeble efforts can avail nothing. But it was my duty to make them. The meditated blow is mortal, and from the moment it is struck, we may bid a final adieu to the Constitution.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that he did not rise for the purpose of assuming the gauntlet which had been so proudly thrown by the Goliath of the adverse party; not but that he believed even his feeble powers, armed with the simple weapon of truth, a sling and a stone, capable of prostrating on the floor that gigantic boaster, armed cap-a-pie as he was; but that he was impelled by the desire to rescue from misrepresentation the arguments of his colleague, (Mr. GILES,) who was now absent during indisposition. That absence, said Mr. R., is a subject of peculiar regret to me, not only because I could have wished his vindication to have devolved on abler hands, but because he had today lost the triumph which, yesterday, he could not have failed to enjoy; that of seeing his opponent reduced to the wretched expedient of perverting and mutilating his arguments through inability to meet and answer them. Mr. R. said, that this was the strongest proof which could be given of inadequacy to refute any position. He, therefore, left to the gentleman the victory which he had obtained over his own arguments; but, while he felt no disposition to disturb him in this enjoyment, he hoped he should be permitted to correct some of the misstatements which had been made of his colleague's observations.

In the view which he had taken of the conduct of our predecessors, in the chain of whose measures the law now proposed to be repealed formed an important link, the funding of the debt of the United States, and the assumption of those of the individual States, were comprehended. An attempt is made to construe this disapprobation into a design of violating the public faith. Mr. R. denied that one syllable had fallen from his colleague, indicative of a right, or disposition on his part, to withhold the payment of any public engagements. Against those destructive measures his colleague had raised his voice; against the fatal and absurd maxim, that a public debt was a public blessing, he had indeed protested; but not a word escaped his lips, because no such sentiment lurked in his heart, which could be construed into a declaration that the present Legislature possessed the same power over the engagements of former Legislatures which they possessed over ordinary laws; that of modifying or abrogating them with the same freedom which had been exercised in their establishment. Since the gentleman had betrayed such peculiar sensibility on the subject of the debt, Mr. R. relied on his support, when a measure should be brought forward for its final and rapid extinguishment, not by a sponge, but by a fair reimbursement of one hundred cents for every dollar due.

On other topics, the Algerine depredations, Indian war, &c., it might as easily be shown that the representation had been equally unfair. He should not dwell upon them, because they were less calculated to make the unfavorable impression on the public mind, which had been attempted on the subject of the debt. He would dismiss them with a single remark: the uses to which these incidents were applied, and not the events themselves, formed the subject of his colleague's animadversions.

But to the long catalogue of unpopular acts which have deprived their authors of the public confidence, the gentleman tells us, he and his friends were "goaded" by the clamor of their opponents. He solemnly assures us, that in the adoption of those measures they clearly foresaw the downfall of their power; but impressed with a conviction that they were essential to the public good, and disdaining all considerations of a personal nature, they nobly sacrificed their political existence on the altar of the general welfare; and we are called upon now to revere in them the self-immolated victims at the shrine of patriotism. These are, indeed, lofty pretensions; and although I shall not peremptorily deny, in this age of infidelity, I may be permitted to doubt them; for I call upon this Committee to decide whether, in this day's discussion, the gentleman has evinced that purity of heart, or that elevation of sentiment, which could justify me in clothing him with the attributes of Curtius or of the Decii?

In the wide range which the gentleman has taken, the question how far the common law of England is the law of the United States in their confederate capacity, has been raised. We are told "that the terms of the common law abound in every page, and in almost every line of the Constitution; that without it, that instrument is unintelligible and inefficient; that, therefore, it attaches to the Constitution. Moreover, that it is the law of the States, by the acknowledged principle, that colonists carry to their newly adopted country, so much of the law of their parent State, as is applicable to their new condition." That the common law is to settle the meaning of common law phrases, few will feel disposed to deny: that when the Constitution uses the term "court," it does not mean "jury," and that by "jury," is not intended to express court, seems plain enough to any capacity. But because the common law is to be resorted to for an explanation of these and similar terms, does it follow that that indefinite and undefinable body of law is the irrevocable law of the land? The sense of a most important phrase, "direct tax," as used in the Constitution, has been, it is believed, settled by the acceptance of Adam Smith; an acceptance, too, peculiar to himself. Does the Wealth of Nations, therefore, form a part of the Constitution of the United States? Will gentlemen please to specify, also, whether that common law which they have adopted for the United States, be the common law as it stood modified by statute in the reign of Elizabeth and James the First, prior to the existence of the act of habeas corpus, divested of all the salutary provisions afterwards introduced at the Revolution; or, whether it be the common law of the time of George the Second? Whether we are to be governed by the common law of Sir Walter Raleigh and Captain Smith, or that which was imported by Governor Oglethorpe; or on which of the intermediate periods they have chosen as fixing the common law of these States?

I wish especially to know, whether the common law of libels which attaches to this Constitution, be the doctrine laid down by Lord Mansfield, or that which has immortalized Mr. Fox? And whether the jurisdiction thus usurped over the press, in defiance of an express amendatory clause, which must be construed to annul every previous provision, if any such there be, which comes within its purview, be an example adduced to illustrate the position, which I certainly shall never contest, that "what the Constitution does not permit to be done by direct means, cannot, constitutionally, be indirectly effected?" But to reconcile us to this usurpation, we are informed, that the principles of the common law are favorable only to liberty; that they neither have been, nor can be enlisted in the cause of persecution. If I did not misunderstand the gentleman, he said, that no prosecution had occurred under that law. He has therefore never heard of the case of Luther Baldwin. I speak of the New Jersey case; nor that of Williams. Other instances, I learn from high authority, have taken place in Vermont.

Mr. R. apologized for detaining the Committee so long on topics irrelevant to the subject. He said he would offer some reasons in favor of the expediency and constitutionality of the bill before them. He had not heard any argument on this occasion more satisfactory to him than those urged at the time when the law was passed, in favor of the expediency of the measure. He had waited in expectation that gentlemen would endeavor to prove, that the former judges, under a different arrangement, would be inadequate to the duty of holding the circuit courts. A belief that every real objection to the former system might have been obviated by some modification of this kind, had induced him to dissent to the passage of the law in the first instance. That dissent was recorded on the journals of the House; and so many members of the Committee stood in the same predicament, that if a sense of his duty to himself and the House were insufficient to deter him, that fact alone, of which the gentleman was himself a witness, ought to have repressed the aspersions which he cast upon a great portion of the Committee, whom he represented as the mere puppets of Executive influence, acting upon no convictions of their own, but played off by an invisible, although not unknown hand. Yes, sir, objections to this system are treated as if altogether unheard of until of late, although a very formidable minority have uniformly been found opposed to it. Nevertheless, this is altogether the work of the Executive, who, by the slightest expression of disapprobation, could yet arrest the measure and save the Constitution.

Mr. R. said he was unhackneyed in the ways of majorities; his experience had been very limited; but was he to conclude, from these observations, that it was the common law, the uniform usage heretofore of this Government, for this House to be the mere instrument for effecting the Executive will, a Chamber for enregistering Presidential edicts? It is said, that the document on this subject was one which the Executive had no right to lay before the House. When did the right of the President to recommend modifications of the Judiciary system cease? Such recommendations had heretofore formed a prominent feature in two successive Executive communications made at the commencement of two successive sessions of Congress. Did the right of the Executive to recommend, and of Congress to act, cease at the precise period when the faultless model of the last session was perfected? Mr. R. said, that the gentleman from Delaware had taken such a range, and thrown out such a vast deal of matter, that, in attempting to reply to some of his observations, he was necessarily led into many desultory remarks. The present system, it seems, was necessary, from the inevitable corporeal infirmity of the judges: the unavoidable effect of the tedious probation indispensable to that venerable station.

Let us compare the former practice with the present theory. The judge of one of the two districts into which Virginia had been divided, was contemporary with him at school. He is certainly neither an infirm nor hoary sage. His associate from Maryland had been an active and gallant partisan at the siege of Pensacola, during our Revolutionary war: not contending, however, under those banners where you would have expected to find a man who occupied so dignified a station under the Government of the United States; but fighting the battles of his King. Bravely, yet, alas! unsuccessfully contending against the spirit of insubordination and jacobinism which threatens to sweep from the earth everything valuable to man, against which the gentleman from Delaware is also eager to enter the lists. The selections which have been made from either House of Congress seem to have had as little reference to age and experience, which are said to be indispensable to the Judicial character. Upon a subject connected with those appointments, we have been told that the Executive had a right to presume a vacancy in all cases where a judge of an inferior tribunal had been appointed to a seat on the bench of a superior court; and that the new office vests, not at the time when the judge is notified of his promotion, nor at the date of his acceptance, but from the date of his commission. Mr. R. said, that he certainly did not mean to contend with the gentleman from Delaware on points of law, yet he would put a question to that gentleman. It will readily be conceded, that the vacating of the former office is the condition of the acceptance of the latter. Suppose a judge, after the date of his new commission, but prior to his notification or acceptance thereof, perform a Judicial act, was that act, therefore, invalid? Could his successor, on the receipt of his commission, exercise the functions of judge, prior to the resignation of the former incumbent? Could any office be at the same time in the possession of two persons? Did not this doctrine imply a right on part of the Government to anticipate the resignation of any judge, to compel his assent to an act vacating his office? The new commission, under these circumstances, either did or did not give a claim to its possessor on the office. If it did not, the Executive had a right to withhold it. If it did, a judge may be expelled from office, without his consent, and provided at any time afterwards he shall acquiesce, the expulsion is legal. Besides, by what authority does a member of this House hold his seat under an election previous to his appointment of district judge of North Carolina? For this office a commission was issued, as I am credibly informed. But, sir, we shall be told, that the manner in which this affair was transacted ought not to affect our decision. It is with me an irrefragable proof of the inexpediency of the law, and of course conclusive evidence of the expediency of its repeal.

But the Constitution is said to forbid it. And here permit me to express my satisfaction, that gentlemen have agreed to construe the Constitution by the rules of common sense. This mode is better adapted to the capacity of unprofessional men, and will preclude the gentleman from arrogating to himself, and half a dozen other characters in this Committee, the sole right of expounding that instrument, as he had done in the case of the law which is proposed to be repealed. Indeed, as one of those who would be unwilling to devolve upon that gentleman the high-priesthood of the Constitution, and patiently submit to technical expositions which I might not even comprehend, I am peculiarly pleased that we are invited to exercise our understandings in the construction of this instrument. A precedent, said to be quite analogous, has been adduced—the decision of the judges of Virginia, on a similar question. A pamphlet, entitled “A Friend to the Constitution,” has been quoted. Public opinion informs me that this is the production of the pen of a gentleman who holds a pre-eminent station on the Federal bench. Am I so to consider it? If this be understood, it is entitled to high respect; the facts, at least, must be unquestionable.

The courts of Virginia consisted of one general court of common law; a court of chancery, composed of three judges; and a court of admiralty. The judges of all those courts held their offices during good behaviour; and did, by law, constitute a court of appeals. The general court becoming manifestly incompetent to the extensive duties assigned to it, a system of circuit courts was adopted in 1787, and the judges of the court of appeals were appointed to ride the circuits. This law the judges pronounced unconstitutional, and agreed, unanimously, to remonstrate against it. After lamenting the necessity of deciding between the Constitution and the law, and that, in a case personally interesting to themselves, they say, “on ‘this view of the subject, the following alternatives presented themselves; either to decide the ‘question, or resign their offices. The latter ‘would have been their choice, if they could have ‘considered those questions as affecting their individual interests only.” Yes, sir, and such was the character of those men, that none doubted the sincerity of this declaration. They then go on to declare, that the Legislature have no right even to increase their duties, by a modification of the courts; a privilege for which no one here has contended. In respect, much more, it is believed, to the characters of those venerable men, than to this opinion, the Legislature did not enforce the new regulations. The law was new-modelled, a separate court of appeals established, the judges of which were to be elected by joint ballot, in conformity with the Constitution. New members were added to the general court, and it was declared to be their duty to ride the circuits. The judges of chancery, of the general court, and court of admiralty, who had not been elected, in pursuance of the Constitution, judges of appeals, but on whom that duty was imposed by law, were relieved from the further discharge of it. In this arrangement several of the judges were understood to have been consulted; and on the ballot, the six senior judges were elected, five into the court of appeals, and the sixth in the court of chancery. Nevertheless, against this law the judges also protested, as an invasion of the Judiciary establishment, denying the right of the Legislature to deprive them of office in any other mode than is pointed out in the Constitution, (impeachment;) but to make way for the present salutary system, they do, in their mere free will, resign their appointments as judges of the court of appeals, and, as they do not hold any separate commission for that office, which might be returned, they do order the same to be recorded.

Now, sir, I shall not contend, as I certainly might, and with great reason, that the practice of Virginia must be considered as settling the Constitutional doctrine of the State, the opinions of individuals, however enlightened and respectable, notwithstanding; under which practice two chancellors have been removed from their office of judges in chancery, as well as of appeals, and the judges of the general court and court of admiralty also divested of their seats on the bench of the court of appeals, although a court of appeals was supposed necessary, and was retained in the new system; nor shall I insist on the disparity between the stability of the judicial branch of Government in the eye of the constitution of Virginia, and that of the United States, respectively, as surely I might. For the constitution of Virginia has a retrospect to pre-existing Judicial establishments, which experience had tested, which were allowed to be beneficial, and which it is contended were sanctioned by it. That of the United States, formed when the Confederacy had no such establishments, is to be created, from time to time: in other words, to be modified, as experience shall point out their defects—this power being devolved on a body constituted by express unalterable provisions. No, sir, I shall not dilate upon these forcible topics; I will concede, for argument-sake, that the doctrine contended for by the judges of Virginia, was the true Constitutional doctrine, and will apply it to the bill on your table, having first applied it to the act on which it is intended to operate. Previous to the existence of that act, the duty of judge of the circuit court was performed by the judges of the Supreme Court, who constituted a court of appeals, and by the judges of the respective districts. These were judges of the circuit court to every intent and purpose, as completely as the judges of Virginia were judges of appeals. By the operation of the law of the last session, they have been divested of this office, and other persons have been appointed to it. Much stress is laid, much ingenuity exercised to make metaphysical distinctions between the court and the office. I will grant all that gentlemen contend for, that there is a wide distinction. Does it affect the case? Does it alter the fact? The late circuit courts were not only abolished—the persons holding the office of judge of those courts no longer hold it; they have neither been impeached, nor have they resigned. They have not even accepted any new appointment inconsistent with it, and by which it became vacant. The function of judge of the circuit court does or does not constitute an office. If it does, then the judges of the supreme and district courts have been deprived of their offices, (the discharge of whose duties, be it remembered, constitutes no small part of the consideration for which they receive their salaries.) If it does not, then the circuit judges are not now about to be deprived of their offices. On the passage of the law of last session, did we hear any protest against its unconstitutionality from the supreme or district courts? Of any resignations of the office of judge of the circuit court, in order "that a salutary system might take effect?" And yet, sir, is not that office as distinct from that of supreme or district judge, as the office of judge of appeals in Virginia is from that of judge of the general court, chancery, or admiralty? Are not the jurisdictions of those courts separate and distinct? Both never having original jurisdiction of the same subjects; and an appeal lying from the inferior to the superior tribunal, as in Virginia, although the officers of those tribunals may be the same individuals? What, then, is the difference between taking the office of appellate jurisdiction from the judge who possessed original jurisdiction, or taking the office of original jurisdiction from the appellate judge? How is the independence of the judge more affected by the one act than by the other?

To prove the unconstitutionality of this bill, then, by a recurrence to the doctrine of the judiciary of Virginia, is to prove the unconstitutionality of the law of which it will effect the repeal. And no argument has been, or, in my poor opinion, can be, adduced, to prove the unconstitutionality of the one, which will not equally apply to the other. No, sir, gentlemen are precluded by their own act from assuming the ground of the judges of Virginia; they are obliged to concede that we have the power, because they have already exercised it, of modifying the courts, and here they concede the question. They tell you that this, however, must, to be Constitutional, be a "bona fide" modification. It becomes them to prove, then, that this is a mala fide modification.

Gentlemen have not, they cannot meet the distinction between removing the judges from office for the purpose of putting in another person, and abolishing an office, because it is useless or oppressive. Suppose the collectors of your taxes held their offices by the tenure of good behaviour, would the abolition of your taxes have been an infraction of that tenure? Or would you be bound to retain them, lest it should infringe a private right? If the repeal of the taxes would be an infringement of that tenure, and therefore unconstitutional, could you ring all the changes upon the several duties on stamps, carriages, stills, &c., and, because you had retained the man and any one of these offices without diminishing his emoluments, abolish the others? Would not this be to impair the tenure of the office which was abolished, or to which another officer might have been appointed by a new regulation? Have not the judges, in the same manner, been deprived of one of their offices? And is not the tenure as completely impaired thereby, as if the other had been taken away also? Although it will be granted that the tenant is not so much affected, since, with one office, he has the salary formerly attached to both.

I agree that the Constitution is a limited grant of power, and that none of its general phrases are to be construed into an extension of that grant. I am free to declare, that if the intent of this bill is to get rid of the judges, it is a perversion of your power to a base purpose; it is an unconstitutional act. If, on the contrary, it aims not at the displacing one set of men, from whom you differ in political opinion, with a view to introduce others, but at the general good by abolishing useless offices, it is a Constitutional act. The quo animo determines the nature of this act, as it determines the innocence or guilt of other acts. But we are told that this is to declare the Judiciary, which the Constitution has attempted to fortify against the other branches of Government, dependent on the will of the Legislature, whose discretion alone is to limit their encroachments. Whilst I contend that the Legislature possess this discretion, I am sensible of the delicacy with which it is to be used. It is like the power of impeachment, or of declaring war, to be exercised under a high responsibility. But the power is denied since its exercise will enable flagitious men to overturn the Judiciary, in order to put their creatures into office, and to wreak their vengeance on those who have become obnoxious by their merit. Yet the gentleman expressly says, that arguments drawn from a supposition of extreme political depravity, prove nothing; that every Government pre-supposes a certain degree of honesty in its rulers, and that to argue from extreme cases is totally inadmissible. Yet the whole of his argument is founded on the supposition of a total want of principle in the Legislature and Executive. In other words, arguments drawn from the hypothesis are irresistible when urged in favor of that gentleman's opinion; when they militate against him, they are totally inapplicable. It is said that the bill on your table cannot constitutionally be passed, because unprincipled men will pervert the power to the basest of purposes; that, hereafter, we may expect a revolution on the bench of justice, on every change of party, and the politics of the litigants, not the merits of the case, are to govern its decisions. The Judiciary is declared to be the guardian of the Constitution against infraction, and the protection of the citizen, as well against Legislative as Executive oppression. Hence the necessity of an equal independence of both. For it is declared to be an absurdity, that we should possess the power of controlling a department of Government which has the right of checking us; since thereby that check may be either impaired or annihilated. This is a new doctrine of check and balance, according to which the Constitution has unwisely given to an infant Legislature the power of impeaching their guardians, the judges. Apply this theory to the reciprocal control of the two branches of the Legislature over each other and the Executive, and of the Executive over them. But sir, this law cannot be passed, because the character of the bench is to be given to it by the Legislature, to the entire prostration of its independence and impartiality. It will be conceded, that measures, such as have been portrayed, will never be taken, unless the sentiment of the ruling party is ready to support them. Although gentlemen contend, that the office of judge cannot be abolished, they are not hardy enough to deny that it may be created. Where then, sir, is the check, supposing such a state of things as the gentleman has imagined, (and which he has also declared cannot be conceived,) which shall prevent unprincipled men from effecting the same object by increasing the number of judges, so as to overrule, by their creatures, the decisions of the courts? Would not public opinion be as ready to sanction the one as the other of these detestable acts? Would not the same evil which has excited such apprehension in the minds of gentlemen, be thus effected by means even more injurious than those which they have specified? Without any breach of the Constitution an unprincipled faction may effect the end which is so much apprehended from the measure now contemplated to be adopted. I might add, that, when the public sentiment becomes thus corrupt, the ties of any Constitution will be found too feeble to control the vengeful ambition of a triumphant faction. The rejection of this bill does not secure the point which has furnished matter for so much declamation. Its friends are represented as grasping at power not devolved upon them by the Constitution, which hereafter is to be made the instrument of destroying every judicial office, for the purpose of reviving them and filling the places with their partisans.

I have long been in the habit of attending to the arguments of the gentleman from Delaware, and I have generally found, in their converse, a ready touch-stone, the test of which they are rarely calculated to withstand. If you are precluded from passing this law, lest depraved men make it a precedent to destroy the independence of your Judiciary, do you not concede that a desperate faction, finding themselves about to be dismissed from the confidence of their country, may pervert the power of erecting courts, to provide to an extent for their adherents and themselves? and that however flagrant that abuse of power, it is remediless, and must be submitted to? Will not the history of all Governments warrant the assertion, that the creation of new and unnecessary offices, as a provision for political partisans, is an evil more to be dreaded than the abolition of useless ones? Is not an abuse of power more to be dreaded from those who have lost the public confidence than from those whose interest it will be to cultivate and retain it? And does not the doctrine of our opponents prove that, at every change of administration, the number of your judges are probably to be doubled? Does it not involve the absurdity that, in spite of all Constitutional prohibitions, Congress may exercise the power of creating an indefinite number of placemen, who are to be maintained through life at the expense of the community? But, when these cases are cited, you are gravely told that they suppose a degree of political depravity which puts an end to all argument. Here, sir, permit me to state an important difference of opinion between the two sides of this House. We are accused of an ambitious usurpation of power; of a design to destroy a great department of Government, because it thwarts our views, and of a lawless thirst of self-aggrandizement which no consideration can restrain. Let us not be amused by words. Let us attend to facts. They will show who are contending for unlimited, and who for limited power. The opponents of this bill contend that they did possess the power of creating offices to an indefinite amount; which, when created, were beyond the control of the succeeding Legislature. They, of course, contend for the existence of such a power in the present Legislature, for whose exercise there is no security but their self-respect. In other words, that if the present majority should incur the suspicion of the people, they may, as soon as there is any indication of their having forfeited the public confidence, on the signal of their dismissal from their present station, make ample and irrepealable provision for themselves and their adherents, by the creation of an adequate number of judicial offices. Now, sir, this is a power which we reject, though it is insisted that we possess it. We deny that such an authority does exist in us. We assert that we are not clothed with the tremendous power of erecting, in defiance of the whole spirit and express letter of the Constitution, a vast judicial aristocracy over the heads of our fellow-citizens, on whose labor it is to prey. Who, then, are, in reality, the advocates of a limited authority, and who are the champions of a dangerous and uncontrollable power? In my estimation, the wisest prayer that ever was composed is that which deprecates the being led into temptation. I have no wish to be exposed myself, nor to see my friends exposed, to the dangerous allurements which the adverse doctrine holds out. Do gentlemen themselves think that the persons, whom I see around me, ought to be trusted with such powers? Figure to yourselves a set of men, whose incapacity or want of principle have brought on them the odium of their country, receiving, in the month of December, the solemn warning, that on the fourth of March following, they are to be dismissed from the helm of government; establish the doctrine now contended for, and what may we not expect? Yes, sir, the doctrine advanced by our opponents is that of usurpation and ambition. It denies the existence of one power by establishing another infinitely more dangerous; and this you are told is to protect, through the organ of an independent judiciary, the vanquished party from the persecution of their antagonists, although it has been shown that, by increasing the number of judges, any tone whatever may be given to the bench.

The theory for which gentlemen contend seems to me far-fetched and overstrained. A mighty enginery is set in motion, which to all good purposes is ineffectual, although formidable in the perpetration of mischief. If, however, the people should be of a different opinion, I trust that at the next election they will apply the Constitutional corrective. That is the true check; every other check is at variance with the principle, that a free people are capable of self-government.

H. OF R.

But, sir, if you pass the law, the judges are to put their veto upon it by declaring it unconstitutional. Here is a new power, of a dangerous and uncontrollable nature, contended for. The decision of a Constitutional question must rest somewhere. Shall it be confided to men immediately responsible to the people, or to those who are irresponsible? for the responsibility by impeachment is little less than a name. From whom is a corrupt decision most to be feared? To me it appears that the power which has the right of passing, without appeal, on the validity of your laws, is your sovereign. But an extreme case is put; a bill of attainder is passed; are the judges to support the Constitution or the law? Shall they obey God or Mammon? Yet you cannot argue from such cases. But, sir, are we not as deeply interested in the true exposition of the Constitution as the judges can be? With all the deference to their talents, is not Congress as capable of forming a correct opinion as they are? Are not its members acting under a responsibility to public opinion, which can and will check their aberrations from duty? Let a case, not an imaginary one, be stated: Congress violate the Constitution by fettering the press; the judicial corrective is applied to; far from protecting the liberty of the citizen, or the letter of the Constitution, you find them outdoing the Legislature in zeal; pressing the common law of England to their service where the sedition law did not apply. Suppose your reliance had been altogether on this broken staff, and not on the elective principle? Your press might have been enchained till doomsday, your citizens incarcerated for life, and where is your remedy? But if the construction of the Constitution is left with us, there are no longer limits to our power, and this would be true if an appeal did not lie through the elections, from us to the nation, to whom alone, and not a few privileged individuals, it belongs to decide, in the last resort, on the Constitution. Gentlemen tell us that our doctrine will carry the people to the gallows if they suffer themselves to be misled into the belief that the judges are not the expositors of the Constitution. Their practice has carried the people to infamous punishment, to fine and imprisonment; and had they affixed the penalty of death to their unconstitutional laws, judges would not have been wanting to conduct them to the gibbet.

A case in the Supreme Court has been mentioned. I certainly do not mean to put my opinion in competition with that of the gentleman from Delaware on a professional subject; but I cannot agree with him that the granting of the rule was not an assumption of the jurisdiction. Suppose a motion made in a court of Virginia for a rule to be served on the Governor of Massachusetts, to show cause why a mandamus should not issue, commanding him to do a specific act; to my unlettered judgment the acceptance of the motion would be to presume, that if the Governor could not show cause, the mandamus might issue. Would not nay court reject such a motion, on the consideration that the Chief Magistrate of another State was not amenable to their jurisdiction? The gentleman from Delaware, doubtless, recollects, and, probably, better than I do, for I believe he was a spectator of the trial, the refusal of a subpoena to a man under a criminal prosecution, (I allude to the case of Cooper, in Philadelphia,) to be served on the President, as a witness on the part of the prisoner. Was that a subject of inferior magnitude to a mere question of municipal regulation? This court, which it seems has lately become the guardian of the feeble and oppressed, against the strong arm of power, found itself destitute of all power to issue the writ. Was it because of the influence and interest of that persecuted man, or of his connexions, that it was unnecessary at that time to exert that protecting power? No, sir, you may invade the press; the courts will support you, will outstrip you in zeal to further this great object; your citizens may be imprisoned and amerced, the courts will take care to see it executed; the helpless foreigner may, contrary to the express letter of your Constitution, be deprived of compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his defence; the courts, in their extreme humility, cannot find authority for granting it; but touch one cent of their salaries, abolish one sinecure office which the judges hold, and they are immediately arrayed against the laws, as the champions of the Constitution. Lay your hands on the liberties of the people, they are torpid, utterly insensible; but affect their peculiar interest, and they are all nerve. They are said to be harmless, unaspiring men. Their humble pretensions extend only to a complete exemption from Legislative control; to the exercise of an inquisitorial authority over the Cabinet of the Executive, and the veto of the Roman Tribune upon all your laws; together with the establishing any body of laws which they may choose to declare a part of the Constitution. Grant this authority, sir, to your judges, and you will have a Constitution which gentlemen who are such enemies to dumb legislation may indeed approve, because it is the very reverse of that which has been the object of their animadversions. To you will indeed belong the right of discussing—there ends your power; the judges are to decide, and without appeal. In their inquisitorial capacity, the Supreme Court, relieved from the tedious labor of investigating judicial points by the law of the last session, may easily direct the Executive by mandamus, in what mode it is their pleasure that he should execute his functions. They will also have more leisure to attend to the Legislature; and forestall, by inflammatory pamphlets, their decisions on all important questions; whilst, for the amusement of the public, we shall retain the right of debating but not of voting.

A new mode of appeal—that of the sword—has been lately produced. It is worthy of remark, that the era of this appeal commenced with the downfall of the power of the last Administration. The political opponents of that gentleman have set him an example of which, I hope, he and his friends will profit. They knew that the Constitution had been violated. It was no business of speculation, but a plain matter of fact. What was their conduct? They preferred submission to civil dissension. They addressed themselves to the good sense of the community, and their judgment has been affirmed by the people, through the medium of the elections. But, sir, another objection is held up as fatal to the bill on your table: that it diminishes the salaries of the district judges of Kentucky and Tennessee, by repealing the law which increased them. Let us examine this fact. By this very law the courts of those districts were expressly abolished; the office of judge of those courts was destroyed. The men, it is true, were retained, and a judicial office given them; but an office entirely different from the former, with distinct functions and jurisdiction, and with different salary. We propose to restore those judges to their old offices by abolishing the new ones, to which they never were Constitutionally appointed. If their appointment was, however, Constitutional, I leave it to the Committee to decide, whether the district judge of Kentucky might not, on the theory of our adversaries, demand both salaries, since you had no right to take away his old office and salary? I have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with the gentleman who fills that office; but his reputation is too high to lead me to suppose such a claim possible. I mean no disrespect to him, far from it, in putting this case. Instead, as has been asserted, of rendering the office of judge a sinecure, as a pretext for abolishing it, we propose to restore the establishment to its primitive purity; to give the judges, both of the district and supreme courts, duties to perform—the latter being, it seems, now destitute of any other employment than keeping the consciences of the inferior courts. We mean to restore the district judges to their office of circuit judge, for exercising whose duties they have been amply paid by the public; to restore the judges of the Supreme Court to the same office of which they have been deprived, not believing a sinecure court of appeals to be desirable. Whence then the clamor that the judicial authority is to be perverted to the vile purpose of wreaking party vengeance? Suppose a case to occur, are not the persons who are to decide of the same political character with the minority? Would that gentleman have any cause to fear the decision of a controversy with a person of a different political complexion, because of that difference? Is not the Judiciary left precisely in the state in which it was a twelvemonth ago? Are not the same principles to govern, and the same individuals to decide?

It is not, however, on account of the paltry expense of the new establishment that I wish to put it down. No, sir, it is to give the death-blow to the pretension of rendering the Judiciary an hospital for decayed politicians; to prevent the State courts from being engulfed by those of the Union; to destroy the monstrous ambition of arrogating to this House the right of evading all the prohibitions of the Constitution, and holding the nation at bay.

If gentlemen dread the act which we are about to pass, they will remember that they have been the means of compelling us to it. They ought to have had the forbearance to abstain from such a measure at such a crisis. They have forced upon us the execution of a painful duty by their own want of prudence. If they wished the judges, like the tribe of Levi, to have been set apart from other men for the sacred purposes of justice, they should have considered well before they gave to publicans and sinners the privilege of the high priesthood. It is said that there is irrefragable proof in the smallness of the salaries annexed to them, that those offices were not established under any improper bias. If such bias had existed, $10,000, or a larger sum, might have been given. To execute a proposition of this sort, I believe nerve would have been found wanting. On that, as on another occasion which has been mentioned, we should have had blank votes. This is, however, triumphantly brought forward as an instance of the want of power in one Legislature over the acts of another. The President's salary might have been increased, or that of the judges, to a million or more of dollars; where would be your remedy? I will tell gentlemen: in a refusal of appropriation. Who would hesitate in such a case? The salary might exceed the annual revenue. This, too, is another instance, I suppose, of the inadmissibility of extreme cases. I should not hesitate, sir, to refuse an appropriation in such a case, and throw myself on the good sense of my country.

The example of a mighty nation has been held up as a solemn warning against an act which is said to prostrate the barriers of the Constitution; to that example be the decision of this question referred. A Government entrenched beyond the reach of public opinion, had for ages been accumulating one abuse upon another; against an authority which time served but to render more intolerable, the nation was compelled to seek refuge in a recurrence to revolutionary principles. And are we, therefore, to sanction a construction of the Constitution which claims irresponsibility for public agents? Which allows no remedy for grievances but revolution, and that perhaps when a recurrence to such a measure shall be too late? Who, after such an example, ought to contend for a perversion to individual aggrandizement of that power which was delegated for the public good?

I have endeavored, Mr. Chairman, in my poor desultory way, to repeat some of the arguments which have been offered by the gentleman from Delaware. Upon some topics it has been extremely painful to me to dilate; they could not have been avoided; they were obtruded upon me. There is one, however, on which it may be expected I should say something. I believe it unnecessary; the poison carries with it its own antidote. Who could have expected such remarks from that gentleman? If, however, he is now anxious to protect the independence of this and the other House of Congress against Executive influence, regardless of his motives, I pledge myself to support any measure which he may bring forward for that purpose; and I believe I may venture to pledge every one of my friends.

The Committee now rose, and the House adjourned till Tuesday next.

TUESDAY, February 23.
JUDICIARY BILL.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. HUGER.—I have endeavored to catch your eye, Mr. Chairman, at this time, under the expectation and in the hope, that as the Committee have, during the two last days, enjoyed a vacation from public business, I shall run the less risk of exhausting its patience, and may calculate the more largely on the good nature and indulgence of gentlemen, in the course of the few observations I shall venture to submit to their consideration. Little accustomed to deliver my sentiments before a public audience, from my mode and habits of life seldom obliged even to concentrate my ideas on a particular subject, I have at no time presumed to address this honorable body but with great diffidence, with the utmost deference. Never, I can truly say, have I felt more strongly and sincerely these sensations than at the present moment—nor have I without great difficulty, and after much hesitation, ventured to offer myself to your regards, and take possession of the floor. Believing however, as I do, that the dearest interests of the community, the very existence of our national Government and Union, are involved in this momentous question, I feel myself compelled, in duty and in conscience, to express my dissent, and enter my protest against the (in my humble opinion, unconstitutional and mischievous) measure, which we are now called upon to adopt, in language more strong and decided than might be conveyed by a silent vote.

When I was before up, Mr. Chairman, on the motion for the postponement, made by the member from Delaware, I took occasion to express my regrets, that a Constitutional point of the first magnitude and importance should be brought forward at a moment so inauspicious to a fair and impartial investigation of it; at a time when the passions of gentlemen had been so greatly excited; when party feelings and party zeal must necessarily have so powerful an influence on their minds; when they had just gained, after a long and irritating struggle, a complete victory over their political opponents, and found themselves at a moment's warning, put in possession of the whole power of the Government. I could not but lament and deplore the fallibility of human nature, and what appeared to me to be the infatuation of men, whom I knew to be wise and honorable. I deprecated and protested against the haste and precipitancy, with which this measure was so unnecessarily hurried on for consideration, and conjured gentlemen to pause and consider whether it was at this moment, and under the present circumstances, that they ought to give a loose to their feelings, and urge the House to decide irrevocably and finally a great and all important national and Constitutional question; involving in its decision the prostration and complete overthrow of the only bar, the only efficient check, which the Constitution had provided, to their newly acquired power; implicated, as it unfortunately was, with another subject, peculiarly obnoxious to them, as a party, and necessarily exciting in their minds so many unpleasant and irritating recollections. Now, sir, let me ask, I submit it to the candor of the Committee to determine, whether the course which has been pursued, and the occurrences which have since taken place, do not fully warrant and clearly evince the correctness and propriety of the observations I made on that occasion? Which of the honorable gentlemen, who have advocated the measure now submitted to your consideration—which of them I pray you, has been able to divest himself of his party feelings and enthusiasm, and laying aside all extraneous matter, has confined himself to the real merits of the question? An honorable member from Virginia (Mr. GILES,) not now in his place, who has, however, taken an active part in the debate, and who, without disparagement to other gentlemen may be regarded as the premier, or prime minister of the day, promised us on a former occasion that he would endeavor to take this course. He told us, that if party sensations ever could be buried, the subject of the bill before us was the most proper to induce both sides of the House to make an effort to that effect—that he hoped and sincerely wished all extraneous and foreign matter might be laid aside, and that gentlemen would meet the question with coolness and temper, and make up their opinions on the subject with a view merely to the simple merits of the case. And if I am not greatly mistaken, the honorable member pledged himself, that he would endeavor to enforce this doctrine by his own example. But what was the fact? Had that gentleman confined himself in the same degree to the real merits of the case? Had he not on the contrary put his memory and invention equally to the rack, in order to ferret out proper subjects for irritation, and to excite to the highest pitch the party feelings and the party spirit of the Committee? Had he not gone back to the very commencement of the Government, giving an ex parte history of all its operations for twelve long years, and brought to our recollection every topic, every subject, which during this period had been conjured up and made use of to prejudice and inflame the public mind against those who have heretofore administered the Government? He had not been satisfied to avail himself even of living objects, but had raked up the ashes of the dead, not certainly to prove the expediency or constitutionality of the measure proposed, but for the charitable purpose of throwing an odium on his political opponents. So far was he indeed from confining himself, as he had promised, to the point in dispute, that his sole aim, his only object, would seem to have been to show that the act of the last session was passed with party views, and party purposes, and upon the same grounds ought now to be done away.
